TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE.

IN 1889 Dr Bar published the second edition of his work on International Law. Although it was styled a second edition, it was in fact a new book, twice as large as the former work, in spite of the omission of the subject of criminal law. The former edition being thus entirely superseded, I thought it desirable to give those who had some acquaintance with the author's work in its English form the opportunity of seeing it in its latest shape.

This new edition deals so fully with the details of the various topics of the subject that it will prove as useful to the practical lawyer as its predecessor was. The philosophic lawyer will find the general principles of international law, as well as those of each chapter of it, fully examined and set out. The only important part of the treatise which an English lawyer will find it impossible to accept in any degree is the substitution of nationality for domicile as the determinant of personal law. So many of the questions of international law that have been dealt with by our Courts have arisen between parties who are all of the same nationality, i.e. all British subjects, although under the dominion of different legal systems, e.g. Scotsmen and Englishmen, that the idea of nationality as a solvent of such questions is unfamiliar and would necessarily be inadequate. But there is no difficulty in substituting domicile for nationality in all those cases in which the latter has been selected by the author as the consideration upon which this or that problem depends; and thus his results are available for the English or Scottish or American lawyer, in spite of this discrepancy in principle.

I have endeavoured, in the notes appended to the author's paragraphs to set out shortly the state of the law in Scotland and England on the various points dealt with by the author or suggested by him. He has gone so fully into the decisions of the Continental courts, and has so uniformly appealed to American text-writers in his own text, that I have not found it necessary to cite many decisions either from Continental courts or from those of the United States. When I have cited Continental judgments, I have given references to the Journal du droit international privé, in which all these decisions are to be found.

PREFACE.

FULLY a quarter of a century has passed since the appearance of the first edition of this book. The conclusions which I then advocated—I shall not say originated—have been upon the whole, but of course with certain exceptions, more and more recognised in judicial and diplomatic procedure, in congresses of the learned, and in legislation and treaties, in so far as legislation and treaties have attacked the subject.

The present, the second edition, has however taken a shape which practically makes it a new work. The size of it, if nothing else, shows this. Although I have left out the subject of international criminal law, which I took up along with civil law in the former edition, still this edition contains more than double the number of pages which the first did.

Various circumstances have combined to effect this. Not only have the questions which require discussion multiplied largely; subjects which, when the first edition appeared, were scarcely noticed in private international law, have in the meantime had much valuable labour given to them, and some of them have been treated of in monographs. This has been the case with nationality, and with copyright, including the law of so-called industrial property; while commercial law, including maritime law, has been much discussed with special reference to its bearings on private international law in a fashion quite different from that of former days. Further, the Revue de droit international, which has appeared ever since 1869, and in a special degree, too, the Journal du droit international privé, have amassed material for illustration of the different topics of our subject in a way that cannot be too highly spoken of, while the literature of the subject has grown in a surprising degree, particularly in France and Italy. So too much of the territory which lies on the boundary line between what is properly public law and private international law, e.g. extra-territoriality, has been more thoroughly explored. Lastly, however, the new Italo-French school of private international law has shown the way to a thorough examination of the leading principles of the science. Even although we may not be able to adopt the principles of that new school, we must gratefully recognise all its services, both direct and indirect. In the present edition, forced as I was to take up a distinct position upon these leading principles, I found that this new school required me to subject Savigny's theory, which up to this time had ruled the German school, to a renewed examination. Even in my former edition I hinted that it could not remain standing without some modification. But as that was a youthful production I could not in it becomingly depart from the principles of the well-known master. Now I think I may say that the ground-plan which I have adopted in my second edition, although it is akin to Savigny's doctrine, has taken up a position beside it, which is not altogether dependent upon it.

The question may be raised, whether the time is yet come for treating private international law as a unity, and without special reference to the law and jurisprudence of the individual states concerned, except in a short sketch, which may serve to give us the bearings of the subject. If an author is to treat the whole subject of private law in different nations thoroughly, he exposes his legal knowledge of the most various topics to a test that is anything but pleasant. Mistakes will very probably be made, both in his appreciation of particular legal doctrines and in his views of the positive legislation and legal precepts of different countries. An author who deals with some particular heads of private international law in a monograph is in many respects in as advantageous a position as one who writes upon that law from the point of view of one country only. As a fact, so quickly do laws alter in our time, every general work upon international law must be taken, as traders say, "with errors excepted," and any lawyer who consults the book for the practical purposes of some particular case should be warned to apply to legal specialists for information as to the law of the country in which he happens to be interested.

But nevertheless, in spite of these advantages which the treatment of the subject by monographs, or from the point of view of one system of law only, enjoys, science dare not refuse to undertake an enquiry which will include all civilised countries, or at least the most important of these countries. For that there is this reason, if no other, viz. that private international law stands in very close connection with public international law, the law of nations. Any special treatment of the subject, such as starts from the positive law of this or that particular national system, runs this risk, for want of assistance from some general theory, that, from the very narrowness of its field of vision, it may make a mistake in its selection of the proper point from which to set out, or may lose all standards by which to determine the extent of recognition that should be accorded to the different principles of the science in the general organisation of private international law. But, lastly, any special and restricted treatise will always create a feeling of uncertainty, and will be exposed to the danger of being undermined by some new ideas, perhaps embodied in a statute, which are new and fanciful, but wear the appearance of ingenuity. The structure of private international law of the present day, when taken as a whole, is like an artificial arch. Each particular stone appears to float upon the air; it is only those who know the whole who know that it will carry great weight in safety, although they know, at the same time, that it cannot be altered just as any one likes.

I have not added to the various sections of my work a comparative review of the rules of law in different particular States, which may concur with each other, or may differ. If one has not a certain amount of familiarity with comparative jurisprudence, it is not very easily feasible to work out the problems of private international law without losing oneself among unsubstantial phantoms. German literature, above all others, gives us some warning examples of this kind of attempt. I thought, however, that it was not desirable to treat details and theory together. When these are combined, either the one or the other is apt to be taken too shortly; at least, I could not trust myself to do equal justice to both. Besides a detailed statement of actually existing law stands in need of constant correction. At the same time, I hope that the selection of illustrations which I have made from the legal systems of different countries will not be found to be altogether too small. In this way I thought that the leading types of the various developments which different doctrines of law have attained in the most important civilised countries might be presented to the reader, without prejudice to the impression which should be made by the consecutive exposition of the theory of private international law, or of the sound rules of practice to be observed in it, which reveal themselves along with the theory.¹ I had no intention of saying a word of reproach against the works which have undertaken to deal at the same time with comparative jurisprudence and private international law, but my opinion was that the two subjects were better apart.

I have nothing but extrinsic reasons for abandoning the dissertation upon criminal law in this edition, which in the former edition was part of my subject. I cannot share the theory, which has certainly a large measure of support, that criminal international law belongs to another sphere of ideas altogether. I am rather inclined to the view of one of the most recent of French authors (Lainé),² that private and criminal law, including the law of procedure, are bound up with each other by the consideration that the object to be attained is to settle what is the treatment which the law should mete out to the individual who is in the midst of a foreign legal order, or, more accurately, to settle the jurisdiction of the instruments of law set up by the organisation of different States over individuals and their rights. This consideration is common to criminal and to private law, in so far as, in the former case, viz., in criminal law, the individual's title to defend the sphere of his rights against the control of the law is concerned. In public law, on the other hand, the relation and conduct of States to each other as wholes is what is considered.³ I should have gladly then retained the original scope of the work, in which criminal law was included. But very recent days have given us comprehensive and valuable works, particularly in the jurisprudence of Germany, upon this subject of criminal international law, at least upon the special subject of extradition. Thus my work on the subject may quite conveniently, for the present, stand over, whereas this second edition was much required, especially in view of the effects which important political changes have produced since the date of the first edition. If I had taken in criminal law, the publication must have been long delayed, and in practical use private and criminal law, as a rule, are separable. Thus I felt myself able to exclude it for a time from consideration.

In my view private international law does not require, as a condition precedent to its existence, that it should have been constituted, so far as its leading principles or doctrines are concerned, by treaties or by legislation. It exists because it is a necessity, and it is the force of circumstances, the nature of things that makes it so. The fact that it embraces a multitude of doubtful and controverted points proves nothing to the contrary, just as little as in other departments of the law. Without desiring to deny the value which treaties and legislative provisions possess in many respects, I believe that I have shown in various ways that treaties and detailed enactments of the legislature, the difficulties of which can only be disregarded by superficial observers, have sometimes done more harm than good in this field, in which every arbitrary measure brings its own revenge, just because the essential characteristics of the subject are determined by the real nature of things.

But I am just as far from believing that what is termed an international uniformity of legislation will make private international law for the most part a superfluity.⁴ There are no doubt certain territories in which such an uniformity of legislation may at times be adopted with profit, although perhaps it should be even there confined to a few propositions. But the extent of these territories is small. On the other hand, too extensive an uniformity in the laws of civilised States would do much to check progress, which for the most part is dependent on each State enjoying freedom of movement. It is the task of private international law to maintain harmony amidst this freedom of the different legal systems, which are not to be prevented from solving the problems of civilisation in various ways.

The part which private international law has to play in the work of civilisation—it is still treated in Germany as a sort of step-child of the philosophy of law—may appear modest as compared with that of public international law; still, it is important enough. It protects and assures the peaceable intercourse of private persons in different nations. In this way, therefore, it maintains the threads,—which, fine as they are, still together will sustain great things,—on which the exchange of goods and of ideas, the mutual respect of nations, and therefore the maintenance of peace, depend. In the outset of national history hatred of all who do not belong to the nation, and the exclusion of them from intercourse, are, as a rule, the leading principles. It is, however, a sign of strength and prosperity in peoples and States that they should receive strangers hospitably, and should cultivate closer international fellowship, to the advantage of humanity at large, without injury to their appreciation of their individual nationality, and without anxiety about it.

INTERNATIONAL LAW

First Book.

THE OBJECT AND THE SCOPE OF PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW: ITS HISTORY AND GENERAL THEORY.

I. THE OBJECT AND THE SCOPE OF PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW.

§ 1. As soon as the citizens of different States or communities¹ begin a lawful traffic with each other, it must be determined in one way or another whether the rules of law² which are recognised in one particular State or community are to be applied to their legal relations,³ and to what extent they are to be so applied. To find the answer to this group of questions is the task of private international law. It may also be said: Private international law determines the limits of the application of the legal systems of different States in private legal relations; and, again, as the jurisdiction of State authorities—courts or magistrates—which may trench upon private legal relations, depends upon the applicability of the legal system, it may be put still more clearly thus: Private international law determines the applicability of the legal systems and the jurisdiction of the agencies—the courts and magistrates—of different States in private legal relations.⁴

² We say “rules of law” advisedly, for assuredly it matters not whether we have to deal with statutory law or customary law. When we speak hereafter of the “laws” (Gesetze) of a State, that is understood to include customary law and the practice of the courts, which to some extent supplies the place of positive law.

⁴ We say “private legal relations,” and not “legal relations of private persons,” because we may have to deal with the legal relations of a State, in so far as a State enters into private legal relations; while, on the other hand, a private person may have legal relations which must be exclusively determined on principles of public law, the law of nations in the narrower sense.

It is plain that, if there is to be any orderly and secure intercourse among the citizens of different States, an indiscriminate application of the native law of that State alone to which the court that happens to have to determine the suit belongs, would lead in many cases to a simple denial of the rights of the foreigner, and even of the native citizen himself, or in other words, would deprive international intercourse of all legality. Would that not be the case if a marriage contracted abroad between foreigners, or the acquisition in some foreign country of a thing that was situated there, should be refused recognition simply on the ground that our law requires different forms for the celebration of marriage and the acquisition of property from those which are prescribed abroad? If we wish to secure persons and things in their intercourse with our country, we must to a certain extent—how far, need not in the meantime be discussed—allow these persons and things to come in among us with a certain legal character, i.e. with the legal character which the foreign law has given them. On the opposite view we should simply deny all virtue to the legal community to which these persons and things once belonged, or, in other words, deny that this foreign legal community was a legal community or a State at all.

PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW AND THE LAWS OF PARTICULAR STATES.

§ 2. These remarks have already shown that the rules of private international law cannot possibly be dependent merely upon the arbitrary determination of particular States. The State cannot assert the competency of its own legal system in absolute independence of other States, and in the face of their sovereign rights, which are of as much weight as its own. Such a claim will most assuredly be met by certain limitations belonging to the law of nations,⁵ e.g. by the proposition that no State can exercise a power of compulsion within the territory of another. The same considerations also prove private international law to be an independent department of law; it is not, as Lorimer⁶ has recently of new affirmed, merely a part of the domestic law of each State. In the abstract, every State can determine its own legislation as it pleases; the effect of its laws upon legal relations, which have any

No. 5; Martens, ii. § 68. Brinz expresses himself most pointedly and cleverly as to this principle of the law of nations (Pandecten, 3 Aufl. i. p. 23, i. p. 349 et seq.); in the same way Harrison, J. de dr. 7, p. 417 et seq. See, too, Bard in his preface.

⁶ Lorimer's view (i. pp. 349 et seq.) seems all the more astonishing, as he admits that the separate treatment of private international law is to be recommended, and describes it as the "doctrine of jurisdiction," and as he very properly lays it down that the development of private international law is certainly not to be obtained exclusively by means of the courts of the various States through actual processes, but that its propositions of law of themselves regulate men's lives and commerce. Bard thinks that by means of treaties the principles of international legal maxims belonging to the domestic law of each separate State may assume the connection with a foreign country, will be determined by the nature of the subject—i.e. by the requirements of an orderly and lawful intercourse, and by the respect which is due to the sovereign power of other States. The false impression that private international law is only the domestic law of each separate State, and that it is impossible for us to set up rules that are generally recognised for the intercourse that is nowadays carried on among civilised States, proceeds on the one hand simply from the fact that the courts of the different States, subject as they are to their own legislature, must follow the directions of that legislature as to their own jurisdiction, even when these are mistaken;⁷ and arises on the other hand from the extraordinary difficulty and doubt that belong to very many of its questions. In particular cases which happen to fall under the jurisdiction of the courts of this or that State, these courts will recognise only that theory of jurisdiction in international questions, which is peculiar to the law of their State; and just because of the doubts and difficulties of particular cases, we find that many blunders and encroachments by this or that system of law, and this or that State authority, are acquiesced in in the intercourse of nations, that is to say, so far as public law is concerned. But if it can be shown that these mistaken decisions on jurisdiction are errors and blunders,⁸ then in the end the pressure of the general conviction on the subject, working along with the might of commercial intercourse, will force them out of the way. Besides, since the instructions of the legislatures of the different States as to the international application of their maxims of law are not, as a rule, very detailed or excessively distinct, there is, as a matter of fact, a very considerable field for the operation of a general theory of the proper determination of such questions of jurisdiction. If the independence of so-called private international law as against the laws of each particular State is denied,⁹ it follows that on the same ground the existence of a number of principles which unquestionably belong to public law, such as the extra-territoriality of sovereigns, ambassadors, etc., must be pronounced to be doubtful,¹⁰ because there may be some State that has adopted these character of true international law. This view falls with the theory that nothing is law which does not rest upon an express declaration of the legislative powers. Is that not also law, which necessarily corresponds to the nature of the subject? Dicey, in his Law of Domicile, Introduction iv. v., says that the propositions of so-called private international law are, in so far as international, not law in its strict sense.

⁹ In the most extreme cases, e.g. in cases where an undoubtedly perverse application of the law of any particular State would result in the direct spoliation of foreigners, it may be that the remedies of public law will be used against such stretches of competency. But this is not easily brought about, because, as Lorimer himself observes, the jurisdiction and the legal system of every State is entitled to the presumption of honest intention in these matters.

¹⁰ Reinh. Schmid. p. 22, in the same way as Lorimer.

principles in its territorial law in a very faulty or fragmentary form, while, of course, its courts and officials are bound by that faulty form.

POSSIBILITY OF A GENERAL THEORY OF PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW.

§ 3. It is not, of course, possible to set up a general theory of private international law in such a way that it shall not constantly require to be supplemented in view, on the one side, of the new propositions of law that are constantly arising in the various States, and on the other of the innumerable host of legal propositions that are now in existence side by side with each other. It is only a fraction of these, the applicability of which to international questions can be directly tested even in a comprehensive work. But yet the task of private international law does not sink to that of a mere statistical treatise on law, and an incomplete treatise too. The applicability of territorial rules of law to international questions is measured by certain general and typical characteristics; the international application of one proposition of law may be settled without further enquiry, if the application of a cognate rule is known; the difficulty frequently lies simply in testing a proposition of law with a view to seeing whether, in its international application, it is not to be broken up into more than one rule, one of which has an universal operation in international intercourse, while the other can affect only such things as are found in the territory of the power that made the rule of law. For example, the difficulty may be in testing whether a document, which in its own country at once gives rise to a real right, does not, in a foreign country at least, give rise to a personal obligation to provide the person who holds the document with a real right, in conformity with the forms that are recognised at the place where the thing is.

The eye of the jurist, by long practice, of course grows keener to mark such applications of legal maxims by way of analogy, and to discover their various relations to the system of real or of personal rights prevailing in any particular territory, and to its police regulations or its public order, which must be maintained at all hazards. And thus, where at first nothing was to be discovered but conflicts of legal systems and sovereign rights, amidst which it seemed that the security of commerce, and even the happiness and comfort of many individuals must suffer most grievously, there is often ascertained subsequently to be a complete harmony of legal system. We often ascertain, in such cases, that it cannot, for example, reasonably be held to be the view of one legal system, that the case in question should fall to be governed by it, when it is already, in accordance with the expectations of commerce, regulated by the other systems. It is not, however, meant that there are not real cases of conflict. They are, however, less numerous than might be imagined upon a superficial view of our problem.

The logic of jurisprudence has not, however, the same certainty as belongs to mathematical reasonings. Accordingly, a guarantee for the correctness of juristic arguments has long been found in the fact that tried authorities, writers, and tribunals have reached the same results. This respect for authority is, however, of special importance in the region of private international law; for there, because of the very scarcity of legislative utterances on the international application of legal propositions, and occasionally also because of their dubiety, we enjoy considerable freedom in forming deductions from the nature of the subject in hand, which have also a large possibility of error. It is, therefore, the authors of highest repute in the domain of private international law who have laid great weight upon the citation of other authorities.¹¹ On the other hand, writers who have set about their task with the à priori logical method alone, have undoubtedly missed the right road. Citations, carefully collected and critically examined,¹² are, in private international law, no pedantic display, but an absolute necessity, if any certain results are to be attained, and it is hardly possible to reach a tenable position by this means without considerable labour.¹³ On this ground,¹⁴ it is not advisable to set up a complete theory of private international law as an episode in working out some particular system of law which has not much comprehensiveness.¹⁵ But, at the same time, there is no doubt that authors engaged in working out particular systems of law may do a real service to the development of private international law by bringing into view and illustrating some details.¹⁶

REAL VALIDITY OF PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW. LAW OF CUSTOM.

§ 4. It can be demonstrated that there is to a certain extent a real communis consensus of civilised States, a true law of custom.¹⁷ That is ¹¹ The deliverances of legislatures count as authorities.

¹³ Fusinato (Introduzione, pp. 7, 8) pleads in eloquent words for the independent treatment of private international law. He puts it that only in that way, and not by being discussed within the confines of the legal system of the particular State, can that commanding position be attained, from which the legal system of each State can have its proper place assigned to it, and those deplorable conflicts may be avoided, in consequence of which the same actual state of relations is recognised in one state as legal, in another is looked on as invalid.

¹⁴ Thus e.g. the works of Th. Pütter Das praktische (!) Europäische Fremdenrecht (1846), and of L. Pfeiffer Das princip des Internationalen Privatrechts (1851), are utterly worthless.

¹⁶ There is, however, no objection to a summary exposition of private international law in a handbook of common law. But it is dangerous on such an occasion to lay down in a couple of lines or pages a new theory, or enter upon a criticism that goes to the root of the subject.

e.g. distinctly the case with regard to the rule known to all, that a legal transaction, putting special exceptional cases aside, will be universally regarded as validly concluded so far as form is concerned, if it answers to the form which is required by the law of the place where the transaction takes place. Locus regit actum. Of course, every State has, in the abstract, the power of denying effect within its own territory to such a law of custom. But up to that limit the general law of custom, if it can really be shown to be such, will be recognised in the individual States. A law of custom is simply the instinctive development of right, tied down to no particular form, and this instinctive development does not draw its virtue from the will of the State. We cannot admit the objection, therefore, that there can be no such thing as a general law of custom, with reference to the rules of private law, for the whole of the civilised world. The boundary of the State has this significance merely, that it can deny effect to such universal propositions of customary law, a denial which, as a rule, will draw down upon itself and its citizens considerable disadvantages.

INDEPENDENT TREATMENT OF PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW.

§ 5. As a matter of principle, no objection can be taken to the conjunction of private international law with public law. There are indeed subjects which are common to both—e.g. the doctrines of allegiance and extra-territoriality, and on this ground it might seem desirable to treat them together. But in that case, private international law could on no account be represented as an entirely subordinate division of public law.¹⁸ It would be, as a matter of principle, correct to take up public law and private international law together, under the description "international law." But in that case a division must be made into—1st, the international law of States (public law); 2nd, the international law of private persons; 3rd, international criminal law; and 4th, international law of process, both civil and criminal.¹⁹ But there is this difficulty in the way of combining private international law and criminal law with public law, viz. that private international law (including in it criminal and process law) is in itself a most comprehensive subject, and for this reason may get rather scant justice in such an arrangement. Besides, it is not every one who is an authority on public law properly so-called, who has also a knowledge of private law sufficient for the treatment of private international law, or has the necessary experience in dealing with disputed points of private law.

DIFFERENT TITLES FOR "PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW."

§ 6. According to strict logical interpretation, the title "Private International Law" cannot be altogether approved, and has frequently been challenged. It would be more exact to call it, "The international legal treatment of private persons;" for "Private International Law" seems at first sight to point to the relations of different States or nations, as such, in matters of private law. But the expression, "The international legal treatment of private persons" (or, to be still more exact, "of legal relations in private law") is somewhat cumbrous, while on the other hand a title which is not strictly correct does little harm, so soon as it is generally known what is to be understood by it.

Other titles which have been given or suggested are either exposed to still graver objections, or have met with still less general approval.

Thus, as Savigny (pp. 3 et seq. § 344, Guthrie, p. 48) has already pointed out, the title of "The Collision" or "Conflict" of laws or statutes which at one time was universally given to our subject, and in more recent times is still used by a section of English and North American jurists, gives rise to a rival but a mistaken conception of the subject.

That title assumes that, so soon as a question as to the application of the laws of different States to the particular case comes up, these laws will always come into collision. Now it is quite possible that they should all be in harmony, and should all commit the decision to the same legal system, and to the same tribunal. As a matter of fact this is what generally happens, even in cases which are apparently the most complicated, as we shall perhaps be able to prove in the sequel. Collisions of law are, as Savigny pointedly remarks, in their nature secondary and subordinate questions. A conflict of laws is not caused by the difference of the laws which may possibly be applied to any particular case, but arises only when the legal systems of different States, differing among themselves, all claim that a particular case shall be submitted to their own jurisdiction. That, however, there are cases of this latter description we do not, as has been said, propose to deny.

Savigny and numerous German writers following him²⁰ use the expression, "local limitations of the rules of law." But, if it is admitted that there are certain rules of law which accompany the person everywhere—that the law of our State must, for instance, be frequently applied by a foreign judge, we have ground enough for holding that a title, which makes the scope of the operation of a rule of law in international intercourse appear to be local, is not exactly appropriate. On the contrary, one would rather be disposed to speak of the movement of the rule of law with the person or thing to which it belongs into foreign states, so that, as a matter of fact, the place where the thing or the person may subsequently be found would be of no consequence. But, apart from this, the expression is seen to be inadequate, if, as is the case with Savigny, domicile and allegiance are drawn into the circle of discussion, since the whole subject of these doctrines is the enquiry whether and to what extent a particular person, without regard to his local situation, belongs to the jurisdiction of this or of that State.

In some treatises (e.g. Thöl, Einl. in d. D. Privatr. Eichhorn, D. Privatr. §§ 34 et seq.) the subject is treated under the name, "Relations of the sources of law" (more accurately, "of the co-ordinate sources of law"). This expression is no doubt correct, if the enquiry is confined to substantive private law, and it is justified in the textbooks mentioned, because this is the restriction which they accept. But it is not suited for an enquiry which embraces the law of process along with other subjects: for instance, the subject of the execution of foreign judgments can not, it is certain, be brought under it. It cannot, besides, be left out of account, that this title, although it is quite intelligible as the heading of a chapter in a treatise on German private law, is exposed to much misconstruction, if it is used as the title of a monograph.

Holland²¹ has recently proposed the title, "Extra-territorial recognition of rights," but as yet he has not gained any general approval for it. The expression hints too plainly at a particular theory of international law, which is much disputed—the theory of the recognition of vested rights; and again, as we have said, in all such questions the point is not simply absolute correctness, but also handiness.²²

After all, we shall do best to stick to the expression, "Private International Law." We know what we are to understand by it, and it undoubtedly prevails in the jurisprudence of France and Italy, while in the scientific literature of other nations it is upon the whole more used than any other.²³

We must, of course, remember that the questions, with which private international law is concerned, may come up in the relations of the systems of law in different provinces, towns, or localities of one and the same State.

²¹ Revue. xii. p. 574 [see also Holland's "Jurisprudence," p. 288]. So, too, Torres Campos, pp. 31, 32. The expression proposed by Harrison, "international law," is altogether inadequate. See, in criticism of it, Holland ut cit.

²³ In this sense see also Fusinato, Introduzione, p. 9.

IS THERE AT PRESENT A COMPREHENSIVE SCIENCE OF PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW? TREATIES DEALING WITH QUESTIONS OF PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW.

§ 7. But there is a more important question than the question of title, viz. the question whether we can speak of the existence of a science of private international law. If we were to believe the occasional deliverances of some authors,²⁴ our science would be in a bad way. But, so soon as it is admitted that deductions from the nature of the subject in hand, although they are not specially enacted by the legislative power, are yet indeed law, we shall find that there is much that rests upon pretty firm foundations, and on close inspection it will often be discovered that, in the various decisions and opinions, the real difference is much slighter than it seemed from the inadequate or abrupt statement of the grounds on which they are rested.

If we were to think of dating the origin of the existence of private international law, or the science of it, from the moment at which, by international treaties, everything should be so precisely regulated that we could deduce our decisions from them as from a complete code,²⁵ we should be forgetting that, in the most and weightiest questions, the lawgiver and the diplomatist can do for private international law little besides furnishing with statutory force²⁶ the deductions which are drawn from the nature of the subjects dealt with. For there is no department of law in which caprice leads more easily to an absurdity than in the department of private international law, in which the power of the lawgiver comes into collision with certain barriers of public law. And although it is often possible by statute or by treaty to bar judicial decisions from wandering off the right path, on the other hand the mistakes of the legislator or the diplomatist are all the more fatal.

A free practice and science correct their own errors much more easily in a region like this, where deductions from the nature of the subject in hand are the prevailing force. It would be no difficult matter to bring examples of this. Wharton²⁷ is right in declaring himself recently to be against the possibility and the profit of a comprehensive codification of private international law. On the other hand, some authors, chiefly French and Italian—but only a minority, be it understood—too much used to the leading strings of what professes to be a complete codification, and too much swayed by the abstract idea that judicial authority has nothing to do but to carry out the will of the legislator, which has somehow already been determined, seem unwilling to believe that there can be any real established law without such codification.²⁸ We do not dispute the advantage of public treaties for certain points of private international law; these are points in which the question is not as to deductions from the nature of the subject, starting from doctrines which have been already settled by the municipal laws concerned, but where there is a question as to taking up fresh points of departure altogether, as to which there is room for difference of opinion: an example would be the determination of the nationality or allegiance of a person. But in private international law it is specially necessary that the main work should be left to a free science. With every new law in each different State, new problems may emerge. Treaties and statute law would often be unable to give assistance before it was too late; and, on the other hand, science, if she were too much confined by positive law and had forgotten her free movements, would only be able to do her work in a satisfactory manner now and again.

Stimulated by Mancini, and partly under his direct guidance,²⁹ the kingdom of Italy has entered upon diplomatic negotiations since 1867 with a great number of States, in order to reach a comprehensive system of private international law as generally recognised as might be; but as yet no appreciable result has been attained. The replies of the Ministers of Justice and Foreign Affairs in the most important and the majority of States recognise, it is true, the most praiseworthy exertions of the Italian Government, but by holding back they prove the truth of the opinion we have just pronounced as to the operation of international treaties in the region of private international law.

In the year 1870, negotiations took place between Spain and France with a view to a comprehensive treaty for the regulation of private and process international law in these two States. The idea came from the Spanish minister of that day, Manuel Silvela, and was eagerly adopted by the French premier at the time, Ollivier, without, however, resulting in anything.

In 1878 a congress of the jurists of Central and South America (Peru, the Argentine Republic, Chili, Bolivia, Ecuador, Venezuela, and Costa Rica) at Lima worked out a comprehensive treaty for private international law and legal remedies for the contracting States, which in many aspects deserves recognition. In particular, so far as the equality of foreigners and natives before the law is concerned, it rests on very liberal principles; but it contains nothing at all as to the acquisition and loss of citizenship, one of the most important subjects, and one that particularly stands in need of regulation by treaty. I am not aware whether, or to what extent, the treaty was definitely adopted and put in operation.³⁰

²⁸ Thus Laurent, i. p. 79, assigns in theory a much too narrow task to the science. Happily he has not allowed that to prevent him from giving us, from points of view most freely taken up, very valuable discussions, which he considers, in spite of his theory, to be immediately applicable. And, on the other hand, Laurent himself explains excellently the difficulty of concluding treaties on points of private international law in a comprehensive way.

II. HISTORY.

A. ROMAN LAW.

THE AUTHORITIES OF JUSTINIAN.

§ 8. Many attempts used to be made to find, in the authorities of the Roman law, general principles for the application of the laws of different countries, but with very scanty success. Commentators and authors of later times have hung discussions of their own on the conflict of laws upon isolated passages, especially on the first title of the Codex, de Summa Trinitate. But, as is obvious from the first glance, it is not their purpose to make any special application of the passages which they cite. The discussion, for example, instead of being appended, as was generally the case, to the words, "Cunctos populos, quos clementiae nostrae regit imperium," might have taken place just as appropriately on any other passage. For nothing at all can be drawn from these words save that the emperor can only proclaim laws for the peoples whom he rules, a proposition for which we need not seek authority in the Corpus Juris.

All that can be proved is as follows:—

ORIGINAL OUTLAWRY OF FOREIGNERS, BUT RECOGNITION OF THE LEGAL EXISTENCE OF FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS. FRIENDLY STATES. RECUPERATORES.

§ 9. Like the peoples of antiquity generally,¹ so too the Romans² viewed their law as exclusively national. That is to say, it seems to them to be applicable only to their own countrymen, and on the other hand not to be applicable to things or to persons who, unless in the enjoyment of such special privileges as ambassadors enjoyed, actually found themselves in the dominions of a foreign people,³ with whom the Romans had no special friendly relations known as amicitia or foedus. In strict law, therefore, the foreigner in the territory of another State is at first an outlaw, although custom and religion enjoin that a guest should be protected and respected.⁴

³⁰ The treaty, along with the report of the Peruvian plenipotentiary, Dr Antonio Arenas, is given in a German translation in the Zeitschrift für des ges. Handelsrecht, vol. 25 (1880), pp. 544 et seq.; in an Italian translation in the Document. Dipl. cited in the last note, p. 197. Cf. Torres Campos, pp. 311 et seq.

² Cf. Padelletti Lehrb. d. röm. Rechtsgeschichte, German Ed. 1879, p. 164, and more specially Karlowa Röm. Rechtsgeschichte, i. § 44, pp. 279 et seq. Laurent, i. pp. 667 et seq.

"But at the same time the Romans recognised that the religion, the State, and the law of the peregrini had the same validity in their own territory, and for the citizens who were subject to them, as the religion, the State, and the law of Rome had for the Romans." Roman law and the law of the peregrini faced each other, recognised as independent but mutually exclusive.⁵

But if there was with another nation amicitia, or even foedus, the citizens of this nation were no longer mere outlaws in Roman territory, they were publico nomine tuti, could have certain limited legal intercourse with Romans, and legal disputes between them and Roman citizens were determined by special court (Recuperatores).⁶ In Sell's⁷ opinion these courts were often controlled by special instructions as to the rules of law to be applied by them contained in public treaties, which were their true foundation, although much of course might be left to them to determine according to their discretion.

THE jus gentium OF THE ROMANS AND THE jus civile.

§ 10. By degrees the subjects, speaking generally, of the States with which Rome was not at war, but with which she lived in peaceable intercourse, began to be recognised as capable of legal rights to a limited extent. This did not, however, go so far as to set foreigners on equal terms with the Roman citizen as regarded private rights; they were merely held to be capable of sharing in the institutions of Roman law, in so far as this was required by their residence in Roman territory, or by the intercourse of trade.

For the purposes of trade only, those principles of law which Roman jurists indicated by the title of jus gentium were necessary. These the Romans characterised as a law "quod apud omnes gentes peræque custoditur," so that it could never come into conflict with Roman law.⁸

⁴ As is well known, Greek authors especially frequently speak of this.

⁶ Zimmern, Geschichte d. röm., Privatr. iii. § 17.

Roman rights of succession, family law and property in land (at least in Italy), continued to be denied as a rule to foreigners.⁹ The marriage of a Roman with a foreign woman was not, according to Roman law, for all purposes a valid marriage.¹⁰ A foreigner could not inherit under a Roman testament, and even many forms of the transference of property were inapplicable to the acquisition of property by foreigners.¹¹

Where a rule of law belonged to the jus civile, it needed either a special legislative enactment to make it applicable to the relations of Romans and foreigners, where the necessities of the case inevitably demanded such an application, or else the prætor, in the case of an enactment specially laid down by the legislature, and therefore belonging to the jus civile, but yet at bottom merely the development of some rule belonging to the jus gentium, created the fiction that the dispute was between Roman citizens. An instance of the former is to be found in the plebiscite of the year 561 A.U.C., which extended the provisions as to the legal rate of interest to loans from foreigners to Roman citizens (Liv. xxxv. 7); an instance of the latter is the formula given in Gaius (iv. 37) for extending the punishment of theft to cases occurring between Roman citizens and foreigners.¹²

That the law of the foreign country should be applied in those cases where the legal relations of foreigners fell to be considered as an incidental point before a Roman tribunal, was the necessary result of any recognition of intercourse with foreigners as a legal intercourse. Otherwise, the Roman who acquired any goods from a foreign country would have had no appeal to the right that lay in the foreigner who was his author, and trade even within the empire must have become uncertain. In the same way, in a suit where one phase of the dispute was as to the Roman law of citizenship, a question might incidentally arise as to the validity of a marriage concluded between foreigners, and this was determined even in a Roman tribunal by the law of the foreign country, in so far as it was of importance to determine it (Gaius i. 92).¹³ None of the rules of Roman law that had reference to succession could form matters of dispute except

One may infer that without such permission foreigners could not buy horses. Perhaps the meaning of the division of things into res Mancipi and res nec Mancipi lay in this, that foreigners were excluded from acquiring the former. In the case of res Mancipi, traditio, which was open to foreigners, could not transfer the property, and res Mancipi were the very things which foreigners must at first have been forbidden to acquire. The fact that res Mancipi could be acquired by in jure cessio, goes all the further to show that this is the true explanation, since this form of acquiring property was only known among Roman citizens.

between Roman citizens, for there was no succession between Romans and foreigners. Again, in a question of succession as between foreigners, a question that could only come before a Roman court as an incidental point, the law of the foreign country alone could be applied, if indeed there was to be any recognition at all of succession as between foreigners. This is laid down by Ulpian (Frag. tit. xx. § 14) and by Gaius (iii. § 120) in so far as the testaments of foreigners and obligations transmitted by succession are concerned.

All this is simply explained by the fact that the Romans, as a matter of principle, allowed the numerous nationalities which were subject to them to retain their own law and a certain measure of autonomy.¹⁴ The intermediate stages between a mere alliance and full incorporation were manifold, and the natural result was that foreigners who did not belong to the empire came to be treated on exactly the same principles as the citizens of the nationalities which had been drawn into the empire. Accordingly the jurists speak of them indiscriminately as Peregrini.

The private law of property and rights was, therefore, as Wächter (i. p. 242) aptly describes it, treated among Romans and foreigners as a special part of the law of status belonging to both, which followed the person wherever he went. This condition of things is especially clear in the days of the empire, when Roman citizens lived in all quarters of its dominions, and always observed their own law, without regard to the place where they dwelt. Of course, however, in this state of things the jus gentium had the force of a common law as against the laws of the individual civitates, and the operation of the Imperium, which belonged to the Roman provincial magistrates, was to make some of the peculiar forms of Roman law (in particular the private testament of the Roman citizens, so far as form was concerned) absolutely universal law.¹⁵ more independent, and indeed to master that empire, there was found to be, in dealing with the relations of Romans and Germans, no better or simpler way of treating their various laws than that which had been in use up to this time, and had prevailed among Romans and the Peregrini.¹⁷ The so-called system of personal law, of the earlier Middle Ages, is only a development of the system which the Romans had already observed. It does as little violence as may be to the national peculiarities, and simplifies the combination of different tribes and nations into larger political unities.

APPENDIX.

THE PASSAGES IN THE ROMAN AUTHORITIES WHICH SEEM TO TOUCH UPON THE SO-CALLED CONFLICT OF LAWS.

§ 12. The object of the books of law compiled under Justinian was so practical that they could hardly take up the treatment of a subject so antiquated as the discussions on the conflict of laws that might be discovered in the writings of the classical jurists; and besides, by reason of the great centralisation of the Roman Empire, and the maintenance and preservation of the Roman private law as a privilege of Roman citizens, in contrast to those who had not all the rights of freemen, the Dediticii and the Latini Juniani, no customary laws had established themselves except in a few unimportant matters arising out of the interpretation of commercial instruments. In cases of this kind, however, matters could easily be adjusted with the aid of the principle of bona fides, which in later times was so much extended.

On the one hand, then, this is an explanation of the scantiness of authority upon the conflict of laws in the law books of Justinian; and on the other, it follows that where in the authorities there is a possibility of a double interpretation of any passage, where there is a doubt as to its meaning, one must give the preference to that explanation which does not assign the disputed passage to our subject, just because cases of that kind are not so likely to occur.

The following passages in particular are assigned to the subject of the conflict of laws:—

(1.) L. 34, D. de div. reg. jur., 50, 17. The question discussed here is as to the interpretation of a contract. The passage says, that you must draw from foreigners as well as from Roman citizens the taxes levied on succession. But how could the Roman law of succession have been extended to the citizens of the municipia, if the laws of the family and legal and commercial capacity were not also regulated by Roman law? According to Savigny's view, cases of conflict between the laws of the different States and the law of Rome must have been most numerous, and the want of any decisions of questions of the kind, in the authorities noticed by Savigny himself, would be incomprehensible. A direct authority against Savigny, and in support of the view given above, is the fact recorded by Gellius, N. A. iv. c. 4, that when the right of Roman citizenship was given to the Latin towns they lost their own marriage laws.

have recourse to the express wishes of the parties, and if these are not clearly expressed, that then you must determine the question according to the custom of the locality in which the bargain was made. There is no reference to the form of the contract,¹⁸ or to the essentials of the legal instrument, as has been frequently maintained;¹⁹ the passage takes for granted that the instrument is valid. There is more to be said for the view which makes it a case of conflict between some particular customary law and the meaning of a legal instrument; but, as Savigny has plainly pointed out,²⁰ this explanation is highly improbable: if the question were about a contract concluded in one place, and to be carried out in another, the general expression, "in regione in qua actum est negotium," must almost inevitably have been misunderstood: for on this hypothesis it could not be determined whether "actum est" referred to the place where it was concluded or to the place where it was to be carried out. Taken in its natural sense, the passage refers to the common case, in which two men living in the same State conclude a contract that is to be carried out there.

(2.) The same holds good of L. 6, D. de evictione, 21, 1; L. 1, and L. 31, D. de usur., 22, 1. (See on the latter passage Savigny, § 374, Guthrie, p. 257.)

(3.) Other passages treat of the rules of jurisdiction within the Roman State; and it is plain that if, for example, in L. 20, D. de jurisdictione, 2, 1, it is said "extra territorium jus dicenti impune non paretur," this can only be made to refer, as the second sentence of the passage demonstrates, to the native Roman judge. (See also L. 3, D. 1, 12; L. 16, D. de off. proc., 1, 16; and also Wächter, i. p. 250.)

(4.) L. 65, D. de judiciis, 5, 1, which is by many authors (e.g. Hert. sect. 4, § 30, not. 8; Glück, Pand. xxv. p. 271; Thibaut, Pand. § 323) treated as referring to the regulation of the property of spouses according to the laws of their domicile, only speaks of the domicile as the place in which an action for recovery of the Dos can be brought (Savigny, § 370, Guthrie, p. 209.)

(5.) L. 19 of the same title lays down that actions for debts due by one who has died must be brought against his heir in the place where his predecessor had his domicile: there is no reference to different laws of succession, among which the law of the predecessor's domicile is to prevail (Wächter, i. 250, 251). To take another instance, the rule that questions as to moveables are to be determined by the law of the domicile of their owner (Mevius ad Jus. Lub. Proleg. quæst. 6, n. 20; Hofæker, Principia jur. Rom. Germ. § 140) cannot be deduced from L. 32, D. 20, 1, de pignor., and L. 35, D. de hered. instit. 28, 5. In the former passage, the point discussed is simply, What are the pertinents of any subject? in the second, What is to be the interpretation of a testament in which two heirs were named, one for ²⁰ §§ 372 and 374, Guthrie, pp. 226 and 245.

Res Italica, the other for Res Provinciales, that belonged to their predecessor?

(6.) If the passages which treat directly of a conflict of laws are put out of account [e.g. L. 1, § 15, D. 25, 4; L. 3, § 6, D. de testibus, 22, 5, and L. 31, C. de testam. 6, 23], all that are left are the passages in L. 9, C. 6, 23, de testam.; L. 2, C. 6, 32, quemadmodum test., L. 1, C. 8, 49, de emancip. The first and most plausible of these passages is referred by Wächter (i. § 24) to a case of conflict of laws, and, if this is assumed, would certainly enunciate the rule which, according to the previously cited authorities, is correct, that according to Roman law the form of a testament is regulated by the law of the domicile of the testator.

But, as Savigny notices (§ 382, Guthrie, p. 326), if the passage treated of a case of conflict, the words "patriæ tuæ" must have reference to the law of the domicile of the heiress, and this deliverance could not possibly be correct in law. It is therefore to be understood that the heiress and the testator had the same domicile, and that in that domicile the testator had executed his testament.

The second passage lays down that testaments are opened and made public according to the custom of the place of opening. This enactment, in the first place, has nothing to do with the private law of property and obligations; and, in the second place, makes no allusion to any case of conflict between different laws.

The third passage treats of the powers of the duumviri in cities. Whether a ceremony of emancipation performed before them is or is not valid depends upon whether they have, by special enactment, received the right of "legis actio," and no further explanation is necessary. There is no question of a conflict between the laws of different cities, but merely of the different powers of officers of cities, depending, of course, on the provisions of the laws of these cities. (See Savigny, viii. § 382, Guthrie, p. 327.)

If, then, it be true that provisions as to the private law of property and obligations are not to be found in the law of Rome, it can very easily be understood that there is nothing forthcoming as to the relations of Roman tribunals to those of foreign States. In the days of the Empire, all the courts that existed within it from one end to another were under the supreme jurisdiction of the emperor; and those peoples who were not subject to the sway of Rome, belonged to so low a grade of civilisation, that questions of that nature could hardly arise.

B. THE MIDDLE AGES.

1. SYSTEM OF PERSONAL LAWS.

§ 13. Custom and law were not so much separated from each other among the Germans as among the Romans. Accordingly we probably cannot assert the complete outlawry of the stranger among the Germans so strictly as we can among the Romans.¹ One reason of this is that the Germans, who did not shut themselves up in cities, could not maintain so exclusive an attitude against foreigners. Families, communities, district leagues and tribes, mixed with each other without any exact conditions; and kindred tribes, who must have had all kinds of intercourse on their frontiers, could not well treat each other as outlaws.² It must therefore, to begin with, be doubtful who were foreigners in the proper sense, who should be held to be outlaws. But, of course, the most important protection which the individual enjoyed was that which was secured to him by his family and his clanship; this protection, of course, was not enjoyed by the foreigner. The rising power of the king, however, took foreigners under its protection.³ Merchants travelling from the south, which was much more advanced and developed, brought with them the valuable products of artistic industry; and in particular the kings felt themselves bound to protect the pilgrims and envoys of the Church.⁴

We have already noticed that the Germanic stocks, who came upon Roman territory at first as allies, kept their law, and the Roman subjects who were settled there kept theirs also. The allies became conquerors, but for all their pride, they could not conceive the idea of treating as slaves, or as in any sense beyond the law, the inhabitants of the Roman provinces, who excelled them so much in culture. What made it more impossible was that the heads of the Germanic races gladly took up the dignities of the Roman State, or climbed the throne of the Cæsars as their successors. In this way the law of the different tribes and nations, united upon the same territory, became for each individual a special law of status; and the general state of legal relations was distinguished from the relations of Romans and Peregrini in older times in this respect only, that all those who belonged to the different tribes, except in so far as, by being slaves or on some other special ground, they were denied full rights or liberty by the tribe to which they belonged, were regarded as of full legal capacity for all legal relations. The distinc-

² There is certainly a want of direct evidence from German legal sources, but we may appeal to the provisions of northern laws used by Wilda (ut sup. cit.). In these there are cases where the rules of punishment are graduated according to the closeness of the relations with the country of the man who has been slain.

³ Lex Bajuuv. Tit. 3, c. 14, §§ 1 and 2. Cf., too, Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, 2 Aufl. iii. p. 323.

tion between the jus civile and the jus gentium, which had in earlier times been so carefully developed, had fallen into oblivion. It would scarcely have suited the practical needs of the time, as the most various tribes at the time of the immigration were thrown confusedly together in many districts.

§ 14. In this way⁵ the so-called system of personal laws⁶ arose, a system which, in the great kingdom of the Franks, necessarily became of much practical importance. "When," says Savigny, "a State extended its conquests, and cast other German races as well as Romans under its sway, then the Germanic law that belonged to the conquered race obtained just as general a recognition in its dominions as the Roman law had done; and conversely, in every country that fell under a foreign invader, all the systems of law that were recognised by the conquering race were held good there also. After Italy was conquered by the Franks, the victors introduced all the various kinds of law that were recognised in their own country."⁷

As a rule, every man lived by the law of the nation to which he belonged by descent, and the law of his father's nation of course ruled. The wife and the widow lived by the law of the husband's nation. It was for the first time by a capitulary of Lothair I., passed for Italy, that the widow fell back into the law in which she had been born. Marriage was celebrated under the law of the husband's nation. But the husband had to redeem the bride from her state of pupillage in accordance with her law, although his own law regulated the dower and the marriage present (Morgengabe).⁸ The Church, as an institution which had come over from the Roman Empire, enjoyed Roman law. The individual priests lived among the Longobardi by the Roman law also, but not so among the Franks.⁹

As no one could capriciously change his own rank, so it was forbidden to change the law under which he lived.¹⁰ Difficulties, however, arose when persons belonging to different tribes wished to conclude legal transactions with each other, or when a process was to be decided, in which the parties belonged to different tribes. It was no doubt the fact that in such cases the procedure was not quite impartial; it was only natural that the conquering tribes especially should enjoy privileges in the case of legal disputes.¹¹ The general rule, however, and the one that naturally suggested itself in the circumstances, was that the defender should defend himself in his own courts, and by his own law,¹² in which case a distinction between real and personal rights could scarcely be made, and that a man could only undertake personal obligations in accordance with his own law. In the transference of rights from others, and specially in the case of rights to landed property, the law of the seller was the basis.¹³ The transference was conceived as a renunciation by the lawful owner in favour of the person who was to acquire it, and thus in processes the decision was ruled by the law of the author from whom the possessor claimed to have acquired. Every man's succession was ruled by his own law; so that, if a Roman was to be the heir of a Longobardian by his last will, two or three witnesses were sufficient, but in the converse case seven were required.

Blood money and composition, however, were settled by the status of the person who had been killed or hurt. Both of these were simply the computation of the value which the dead man had had for his family, or indirectly for his nation, and such a computation had to be settled by the place which each nation held in the whole kingdom. The ruling nation could not possibly allow the value of the lives of its members to be determined by the law of any subject race, nor could it sanction a higher rate of blood money for members of the subject race than it approved for those of its own stock.¹⁴ Some laws were good for all the subjects of the kingdom: such general laws make up the principal part of the capitularies.

A condition of law similar to the so-called system of personal laws will always have an object to serve, and will as a matter of fact be found to prevail, in a greater or lesser degree, in countries where the subjects of nations which are of widely different degrees of culture move in close intercourse within one territory. In this way, Europeans live in Asiatic States under their own laws: the law for Englishmen in India is as a rule their own native law, and so in Algeria the French, Mohammedan and Jewish laws are distinct.¹⁵ So, too, within the territory of the United ¹¹ Cf. Stobbe, ut sup. cit. p. 24. It may well be, as he says, that in the law of process Roman law was being gradually pushed aside.

¹² By the 139th article of the Ed. Theod. the competency of the court was determined by the status of the true defender, not by that of his surety (Savigny, § 104c). According to other passages, however, as far as material rights are concerned, there is no doubt that the law under which the author lived is taken into consideration (Savigny, § 46. Brunner, note 27).

States of North America¹⁶ the Indians live under their own law, but they are, for instance, if they reside beyond the limits of the so-called Reservations, which have been made over to them, subject also to certain laws of the United States. The whites, however, even in the reserved territories, are not subject to the law that rules the Indian tribes, unless in some special case of adoption into one of these tribes. There is a peculiar rule of law, that the Indians cannot transfer their lands to others. It is derived, however, not from any special statute, but from the theory of the occupation of the land by the settlers upon it. There is no doubt that, as a practical measure, it is to be commended.

2. THE LATER MIDDLE AGES. THE STATUTE THEORY.

§ 15. In the later Middle Ages the system of personal laws has disappeared.¹ But the change which ensued is by no means, as has been frequently assumed,² the radical change of a system of personal laws being followed by a system of absolute territoriality. The changes which we remark at the time of the so-called books of law (Rechtsbücher, especially the Sachsenspiegel) are merely as follows. After the break-up of the kingdom of the Franks, the different peoples no longer came into contact with each other so often or in such large bodies.³ Hence it became as a matter of fact impossible to keep the law of the individual steadily in view. The court was unacquainted with the personal law of the foreigners brought before it, and was therefore naturally constrained to apply its own law. This was the rule as to the law of evidence, which was so important in the Middle Ages.⁴ Again, as a general rule, a man could only be sued for debt at the place where he lived, and so the law of the debtor's domicile decided claims of debt. There was therefore no longer any attention paid to a man's descent. There was another and an important change, viz.:—that the tribunal of the place where the property lay was the only tribunal recognised for landed estates,⁵ and that on the whole real rights in land were determined by that law.

musulman est Français; néanmoins il continuera d'être régi par la loi musulmane Il peut sur sa demande, être admis à jouir des droits de citoyen français; dans ce cas, il est régi par les lois civiles de la France." The same enactment is made by Art ii. for the "Israélite indigène" in Algeria.

¹⁶ Cf. Wharton, § 9, 252 and Dig. 2, §§ 208-210.

² Laurent, i. No. 178, seems to assume a radical change, with which he associates many thoughtful ideas.

On the other hand, legal transactions, except no doubt such as had to do with the creation or the transference of real rights in immoveable property, began, as a general rule, to be recognised as valid in point of form, if they were concluded in the shape prescribed by the law of the place at which they were concluded. As regards succession in moveables,⁶ the old rule, which left the determination of everything to the personal law of the deceased, continued to be followed. These rules might, of course, be broken in upon by special privileges given by the Emperor to individual States.⁷

We need only further explain at present (apart from the rule that the form of legal transactions depends for its validity on the place of execution, a rule which must be discussed hereafter) the law of the place of domicile and the law of the situs of a thing. There is no doubt that from an early period it had been possible, by special adoption into another national or clan-union, to assume the law of that union; in later days, this adoption was discovered to exist in the acquisition of a domicile.⁸ Then, again, as Savigny has already pointed out, feudal vassalage and bondage transformed every nation from a mass of clan communities into a mass of feudal followers and retainers. "As among the former the law of the clan had been the recognised rule, so among the latter it was the law of service. This law of service or feudal law had drawn most of its contents from the law of the clan, but no distinction was made now according to a man's descent." Where bondage arose, the proverb, "the air makes property," was often recognised: that is to say, that a man became the bondsman of the owner of the land on which he had lived for a year and a day.⁹ This peculiar maxim is not much more than the complement of the other maxim, that residence for a year and a day in a town as a citizen gave freedom to those who had not been free. In both cases it was a question of adoption into a fellowship; in the first the fellowship was not free, in the second it was. As a consequence of the autonomy, which was claimed by the free communities and the over-lords in relation to their bondsmen, it seemed that it must be recognised that these autonomous communities and persons¹⁰ were entitled to prescribe the fashion in which the landed

⁶ Cf. Pauli, Abhandlungen aus d. Lübischen Rechte. iii. p. 36. The law of succession in immoveables was determined by the Lex rei sitae. Sächs. Landr. i. 30. Goslar'sche Statuten (ed. Göschen), p. 30.

⁷ Thus the citizens of Lübeck had received from the Emperor Frederick the First, in 1188, the privilege of being tried everywhere by their own law, and it was not uncommon that the law of a town should, by force of some privilege, extend to possessions acquired by her citizens beyond her own boundaries.

¹⁰ In truth, the landlord constituted a community with his feudal vassals on the one side, and with his bondsmen on the other (see Gierke, Das Deutsche Genossenschaftsrecht (1869), § 15 and § 20). V. Wys, in his paper upon the conflict of laws according to Swiss legal views (Zeitschrift für Schweizer Recht, vol. ii. pp. 34 and 45), has already directed attention to this origin of the territoriality of laws, but at the same time has pointed out that there could be no property which lay at their disposal should be inherited, acquired and occupied.¹¹

THE PREPONDERANCE OF LAND OWNERSHIP. THE lex rei sitæ.

§ 16. At the same time, all that has been asserted by the writers on the French customary laws, as to the territoriality of the different Coutumes in France, remains true.¹² Additional rights and duties were constantly being attached to the different kinds of property in land. Thus the person, putting towns out of consideration, seemed more and more the mere representative of a particular estate, and this view was all the more easily taken up, as the value of moveables was comparatively trifling. The customs and other rules of law seemed to be enacted not so much for men as for the land.¹³ If it was prescribed how a tutory was to be conducted, or how the line of succession was to shape itself, the first matter of concern seemed always to be that the necessary feudal services or returns due from an estate should continue to be rendered after the death of the owner for the time. There was, at least apart from the towns, sufficient stability in husbandry to provide for the persons concerned, if only the estate from which they lived was kept in its proper legal position. At the same time, the whole system of the preponderance of landed property over the person had the way prepared for it by the custom of the Frankish kings, who required a special oath of allegiance from landed proprietors. Then, again, the subordinate landlords, and even the towns, required a special form of submission from all who desired to acquire landed property of any kind in their territory. The idea easily grew up, that one who acquired land in any district belonged to it with his person, and all his personal rights and obligations.

We said already that Germanic law, from its earliest day, by no means entirely excluded foreigners from legal capacity.¹⁴ The union of manifold races in the great kingdom of the Franks, in which the Frankish stock had certainly a preponderance, but not a real supremacy, must have especially promoted the recognition of the legal capacity of foreigners; so, too, must the idea of Christianity, which sees in every man a brother.

But still, in the later Middle Ages, we find manifold limitations of this capacity. The explanation is this. The stronger the bonds of the different communities or associations grew, and the more the general legal union of idea of a completely exclusive territorial law to seize, as a matter of principle, upon all the persons and things found in its territory. Wys cites precise documentary evidence for this, as well as for the fact that frequently the acquisition in full and free property of a piece of ground, by the citizen of a town, resulted in bringing that ground under the law of the town.

¹¹ This autonomy, no doubt, is closely connected with the fact that in the Middle Ages there is no strict division of public from private law.

¹² Cf. Laurent, i. § 193.

¹³ Cf. Wys, ut sup. cit. pp. 49-51.

¹⁴ Among the Gauls the position was no doubt much more like an outlawry. Cf. Durand, p. 32.

the great kingdoms dwindled, so much the more did the legal status seem to be dependent on the employments, the wishes, and the strength of the different subordinate associations. So much the more was it held to be fair, if not to shut out foreigners altogether, at least to throw difficulties in the way of their sharing in the legal rights of the community or association, or even enjoying any legal rights at all. In the midst of their many malicious wars and feuds, men cherished in the small circuit of the town walls, and sometimes too over whole districts, that spirit of exclusiveness and distrust, which rejoices in setting foreigners at a disadvantage, but never thinks that if these disadvantages and disabilities were mutually applied by all communities, the result must be that all should suffer. Exclusiveness of this kind sends its roots back into the old days when freedom was unknown: complete and free¹⁵ connubium and commercium existed only among those who shared manorial rights under one overlord,¹⁶ a state of things which left traces here and there for a long period.

Thus, in very many places, it was impossible for foreigners¹⁷ to acquire land or real rights in land or securities, etc. In some places attempts were made to exclude them from trade by forbidding cellars or storerooms to be let to them. Moreover, very considerable duties were raised from moveable property which, in consequence of succession¹⁸ or emigration,¹⁹ was being taken out of the territory. Foreign creditors were, according to many systems, postponed to native creditors in bankruptcy, and foreigners generally were exposed to many disadvantages in matters of legal process: e.g. they were subject to the so-called "foreigner's arrestment," and as pursuers had to find caution for the expenses of process. A special mark of a falling back into barbarism was shown in the withdrawal from foreigners resident in the country of the right of succession.²⁰ In this way the landlord or prince, as the case might be, held himself entitled to pocket the whole inheritance, or at least only bound to hand it over under a heavy deduction.²¹

¹⁵ The landlord had to approve of any marriage with a member of another community before it could take place.

But the idea is nowhere to be found that strangers should be simply subjected to the law of the territory in all their legal relations.²² Even in the later Middle Ages there was no such thing known as territoriality of law in this sense. Territoriality of the law in this sense is, in the first place, irreconcilable with the security of commerce anywhere, and postulates the idea of a complete and a strained sovereignty. The Middle Ages were a long way from any such notion. It was only by a voluntary subjection, so they thought, that the particular law could be applied to the foreigner; no doubt they took up this idea of voluntary subjection in a very wide sense,²³ and by means of legal fictions they trespassed even its bounds. But all this is evidence against the existence of an idea of an unlimited territorial sovereignty.

OPPOSITION OF THE COMMENTATORS ON THE FRENCH COUTUMES TO THE LATER COMMENTATORS. RISE OF THE STATUTE THEORY.

§ 17. The opposition of the customary laws of France and their commentators on the one side, to the Italian jurists of the Middle Ages on the other, in determining questions of private international law, is not by any means, as Laurent has asserted, absolute, but only relative. One must remember that the former had in view the rules and principles of German law, the latter rather those of the Roman law. It is plain that very different conclusions must be drawn by them.²⁴ Thus German law in the Middle Ages has not yet reached the idea, in the law of inheritance, of a universal succession completely covering the whole mass of a man's property, and in the French Coutumes we have often to deal, not with absolute property, but with the restricted rights of the feudal vassals or bondsmen. The result is a treatment of the case of an inheritance in a way quite distinct from that which is required by the principles of Roman law. Thus it is by no means these later commentators, as the modern Italian school, and Omnes peregrini in Cod. 6, 59 and Pertz, Monum. Germaniæ Legum ii. pp. 243 et seq. (c. 8), that foreigners should be fully at liberty to test, and that, if they died intestate, their succession should be handed over to their heirs, and in particular that the Hospes should keep none of it. This would prove that intercourse with foreigners was not quite so unimportant, even if the fact were not otherwise certified, and that therefore the jus albinagii had not been, as Durand thinks, almost justified by its legal results. It was still a kind of robbery, as the rapacity of those in whose territory the foreigner resided, the "Hospites," shows. Soon after Frederick's ordinance, it was held permissible in Germany to make deductions (Abschoss, Gabella hereditatis) cf. Stobbe, ut sup. cit.

²² Laurent, i. § 201, says, "Toute coutume était réputée réelle, en ce sens qu'elle régissait exclusivement les hommes et les choses qui se trouvaient sur le territoire des seigneurs." This is an exaggeration. See the true view in Rivier (Asser.), p. 8, note 1.

with them, e.g. Laurent, believe,²⁵ who have the credit of bringing the personality of the individual up to the point where the theory of the conflict of statutes begins. There is a simple explanation of the fact that they regarded the statutes, which propose to lay down rules for persons, and which seem therefore to adhere to persons even when they are in foreign countries, as of supreme consequence. In the law of Rome, which was recognised in Italy, the individual was not so much regarded merely as the representative of his land, as he was in France; this difference made itself especially apparent in the rich commercial towns of Italy, which entered into the destinies of Italy in quite a different fashion from the French towns into those of France; and then the well-known jurists were citizens, and highly favoured citizens, of these ruling towns.²⁶

The leading idea, from which these later commentators start, is simply that of the express or implied subjection of the person or the thing, or, at least, of the transaction to some statute differing from the common, i.e. the Roman law. They had no conception as yet of an absolutely sovereign authority in the State, which could treat strangers as it pleased. They hold the theory of the universal supremacy of the Pope in spiritual affairs, and of the Emperor in worldly affairs,²⁷ a theory which, as regards the Emperor, did not by any means square with the fact. But yet they did not in truth ascribe to any territorial lord an entirely unlimited sovereignty, but merely an autonomy, which by fictions is set on a level with the more extensive power. This is the whole origin, combined with the tripartite division of legal relations according to persons, things, and transactions, which recommended itself to a superficial and scholastic logic, of the so-called statute theory—a theory which, for so long a time, dominated the doctrines of the conflict of laws and statutes, and to which in our own time the most modern Italian school has sought again to attach itself.

MEANING OF THE STATUTE THEORY.

§ 18. If, so runs the theory, a statute concerns a person, the operation of that statute cannot be extended to strangers or forenses, as the expression was. Still more the subditus, even in a foreign country, remained continually subject to the laws of his home, in so far as their meaning did not show that they were intended merely to have a local application, as, for example, corn laws, laws as to exports and imports, and other police regulations. On the other hand, if the statute refers to a thing, the law of the place where it is situated must be applied; it was understood, however, generally that this rule applied only to immoveables, since questions as to moveables must be determined by the law of the place where the person—the owner or the possessor—had his home.²⁸ At last it came to be recognised that strangers too might by their own acts, either by concluding a contract or committing a delict, subject themselves to the laws of a particular territory.

²⁵ Cf. Laurent, i. pp. 200 et seq. Laurent can give no meaning to the opposition of the principles of German and of Roman law (cf. e.g. p. 296). He labours at certain mystic peculiarities of "Fendalism" (Féodalité).

²⁶ Cf. Lainé, J. xiii., pp. 149 et seq.

²⁷ Cf. e.g. Barthol. de Saliceto, in L. 1, C. de S. Trin. No. 3, Bald. Ubald. in L. 1, C. cit. No. 20. Lanfranc de Orianò, De interpretatione statut. in the Tract. ill. J. Ct. ii. fol. 391, p. 2. Jason Mayn, in C. 1, C. de S. T. Bartolus, in Dig. L. Nov. 24, de captivis.

The greatest difficulty lay in subjecting foreigners to the laws that have to do with contracts and delicts. But as the sovereignty of States became more fully developed, and trade became more complicated, the former became to a certain extent inevitable, the latter absolutely so. For this purpose the fiction of a voluntary subjection was used, notwithstanding that such a fiction is, at the best, applicable in the former class of cases only.²⁹

On this theory of the later Middle Ages all the authorities may be said to be at one: this principle is adopted as one that cannot be gainsaid—viz. that the lawgiver can lay down rules only for his own subjects, and only in relation to the land that belongs to his own territory; but in these cases he has an exclusive right of legislation. It is, however, matter of dispute which laws are laws of the person, and which again are laws that concern things, and consequently in what cases the law of the domicile or the law of the place where the thing is situated is to be applied. Then there were developed the rules, which we shall afterwards have to discuss more narrowly, that moveables follow the law to which the person of their owner is subject, and that the form of any legal transaction must be determined by the laws that are recognised in the place where that transaction takes place. ("Mobilia personam sequuntur," or "Mobilia ossibus inhaerent," and Locus regit actum.)³⁰

The last rule in particular, as it may often bear some reference to the substance of the legal transactions, gives rise to the introduction of a third class of statutes, Statuta mixta,³¹ although this name, and these technical descriptions of statutes as "personalia" and "realia," are first made use of in later times in the sixteenth century, after the days of Molinæus, Argentræus, and others.

It was the verbal construction of the statute that, in the Middle Ages as a rule, and in later times very frequently, supplied the means of determin-

²⁸ On this point, and generally on the extension of this doctrine, there is very great obscurity. Cf. infra, The law of things.

²⁹ In the Middle Ages Jews were treated as foreigners. In disputes among Jews, the Jewish tribunals decided according to Jewish law. There were many remarkable particular rules of law with reference to legal relations between Jews and Christians. By the theory of the later Middle Ages Jews were outlaws, in so far as a special protection was not accorded to them, and practice often translated this theory into fact in a sufficiently capricious and horrible way. Cf. Stobbe, Die Juden in Deutschland während des Mittelalter, 1866, particularly p. 103 et seq. Heusler Instit. des. d. R. i. § 35. Brunner, i. § 35.

³⁰ Cf. e.g. B. Barthol. de Saliceto ad C. i. 1; De. S. Trin., No. 14.

³¹ On statuta mixta, see especially in later days Argentræus, Comm. ad Britt. leges, art. 218.

ing in cases where an offhand decision could not be pronounced, whether this or that law applied to persons or to things, and whether, therefore, it was to be held to apply outside the territory, but only to native-born subjects, or to be confined to its own country, but applied there to natives and to foreigners alike.

It is well known that Bartolus decided the controversy as to whether a statute, which provided that the eldest son should succeed to his father's whole estate, had the former or the latter scope, by inquiring whether the law said "primogenitus succedat" or "immobilia veniant ad primogenitum;" in the former case, the statute under consideration was to be held to be one that dealt with persons, in the latter, one that dealt with things (Bartolus ad loc cit. 1. Cod. De Summa Trinitate).

And just as little can it be safely assumed that a particular statute will not apply to foreigners on the authority of that often-cited maxim, that no statute can create or destroy legal capacity in a foreigner,³² a maxim which is generally introduced with reference to the capacity of minors in a foreign country. For nothing, for instance, is more certain than that a statute which excludes foreigners from the acquisition of land, is intended to be applied to foreigners; and yet such a statute might easily be considered as imposing upon foreigners an incapacity to exercise certain modes of acquisition. Many points, no doubt, were determined by a consensus of authorities, as, for instance, the legal capacity of minors, and subsequently the question according to what laws the form a testament was to be ruled.

The canon law was from its nature not in a position to lay down any propositions upon private international law: it is the unity of the Church and the subordination of all to one supreme power, that constitute its chief features. Isolated provisions,³³ that seem to tend in this direction, are merely ordinances of the supreme ecclesiastical authority with reference to the warrants and the competency of subordinate officials. Of course, discussions have often taken place upon these passages, just as upon the passage of the Roman law we have so often mentioned. The passage³⁴ of which most use is made expressly leaves the laws of the different territories out of sight, and decides the validity of a marriage by canon law alone.³⁵

C. MODERN TIMES, UP TO THE BEGINNING OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

§ 19. In practical results the views of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries differ little from that of the Middle Ages.¹ The theory of statuta personalia realia and mixta (the last of which were not recognised by all writers) was, as we have shown, involved in the views of the later commentators and of the Italian jurists of the Middle Ages. It now for the first time acquired a distinct technical name.

It is at the same time certainly true, as Laurent especially has pointed out,² that in the course of time the so-called personal statutes gained ground more and more in theory upon the real statutes. This must not, however, be supposed to furnish any historical argument in support of the view maintained by Laurent, as well as by the modern Italian school, which regards all rules of law as being in principle personal statutes, and finds that in their territorial and international operation they have no other limit than the so-called laws of public order (ordre public). The development we have noticed is better accounted for by the presence of Roman legal maxims and Roman legal ideas, which was constantly deepening and gaining ground; in particular it is explained by the Roman idea that the law of succession, and the law of the property of married persons, were not so much laws dealing with the acquisition and property of isolated things, as laws taking up the entire property of a person.

But the gradually rising idea of a complete territorial sovereignty³ rendered a deeper foundation for the whole subject indispensable. The division of laws into those which concern persons, things, and transactions, had arisen in close connection with the autonomy of the communities and the free operation of the will of the individual. How was it possible, starting from the exclusive supremacy of the State authority, to bring it to pass that foreign laws should be allowed to have their course and to be recognised within the dominion of that State?

Two ways were proposed. Sometimes an attempt was made to regard the new theory as a necessary deduction from the limitation to a particular territory now imposed on the jurisdiction of each State, and from maxims of the Roman law (cited, however, in ignorance of their true meaning), which confined the jurisdiction of a judge to a particular district. Sometimes, again, and with greater accuracy, the application of foreign laws was regarded as a concession by the native lawgiver, starting from the assumption that all persons, although they were in the country for a merely temporary stay, were, so long as they remained there, completely subject to the legislative and executive authority of that country.

Both views—of which the first is represented by such men as Argentré and Hert,⁴ the second by Huber and John Voet—are introduced under the are historically correct or fair; both fail to remember that these authors, when they declare themselves to be for the reality or the personality of a statute, have frequently in view principles of law that are perfectly distinct in fact, although in name they may be identical, or very like each other.

³ It is quite an inadequate account of the matter to attribute, as e.g. Laurent does, to feudalism the theory that the superior or landlord was unlimited lord in his own territory. In theory he could not alter laws, although in case of necessity the emperor or king could. The superior or landlord, as matter of fact, could only exclude the application of the common law by means of a treaty or by long continued usage, to which the same effect was ascribed.

⁴ Hertius, it is true, as far as the terms are concerned, throws aside the division into most various modifications, and are frequently treated together by the same writers, according as the conception of the statutum personale and reale is determined⁵ either by its subject—i.e. on the consideration whether the statute has reference to a person or a thing—or by its operation—i.e. on the consideration whether it is to be applied beyond the territory for which it was made, or only within that limit. Sometimes both definitions are taken together. The definition of statuta mixta seems to be the least firmly fixed of all. Some understand by the term the statutes that have to do with legal acts; some the statutes that deal with both persons and things; while others again interpret them to mean statutes that have reference to the forms of legal acts (Aregentr. No. 16, 22. Cf. J. Voet, §§ 2-4).

Particular cases, too, are narrowly discussed. The works of Rodenburg, John Voet, and the more recent writings of Boullenois and Bouhier, supply a rich and subtle body of casuistry; and it may be remarked that on many isolated points these authors, in so far as they have the same particular system of law most closely under their observation, draw harmonious conclusions—as, for instance, with regard to the law of succession, the jurists of the north of France, who take as the foundation of their discussions the old French law of “Coutumes,” which is at bottom pure German law; and, again, the authors belonging to the Netherlands, who spend their labours more assiduously upon the law of the property of married persons. We shall hereafter take the opportunity of using this consensus of jurists, which has frequently been recognised, to support our own point of view, and occasionally employ it as a proof of the existence of a consuetudinary law.

It is instructive to observe that neither of these theories—neither that which derived the limitation of the application of statutes to native subjects and to immoveables situated in the country from the exclusive character of the government of each State, nor that which extended the authority of statutes de jure to all persons and things found within the territory, and could only explain the undeniable exceptions to this rule by considerations of comitas or neighbourly intercourse—could serve as a foundation for comprehensive principles to regulate the conflict of laws. The former is in open contradiction to that which confines the operation of laws to a particular local limit. Another method of reconciling the theory of personal statutes with the territorial theory, in this sense, that now the former and now the latter is to be entirely left out of consideration, can hardly be thought of; for the territorial principle plainly denies that any person can be accompanied into a foreign country by the law of his native place. This territorial principle—or, as the custom was, with regard to Roman law, to express it, the principle “extra territorium jus dicenti impune non paretur”—is only employed as a shorthand solution of difficulties suggested by the theory of personal statutes, or in order to supply a principle which it was considered necessary to postulate, but which could not be established in any other way.

Statuta personalia, realia, and mixta; his views, however, really contain precisely the same theory. Cf. Wächter, i. p. 281.

The second theory, which sets up as the source of the application of foreign laws a voluntary concession by the supreme authority of the State, will disappear into capricious determinations if it is to take this concession purely as a favour and an act of friendship shown to the foreign country. It may easily be seen, in the writings of the different adherents of this school, to what a length may be carried the axiom that foreign laws are not to be allowed to prejudice our own, or to operate disadvantageously to our citizens and our State. That axiom is one by means of which an impassable limit can be assigned to “comitas,” and the only question that remains is, whether this limit, if narrowly observed, does not destroy altogether the sphere for the application of foreign laws, or, if it cannot practically be destroyed, shows it to be purely capricious.

With these two leading principles others are connected, now in one way, now in another; for example, statutes are divided into favorabilia and odiosa, the latter being confined in their operation to their own territory, the former being allowed the like effect beyond it.⁶ But every regulation of private law can be ranked under one of these categories as well as under the other.

A statute by which women are excluded from succession to land by male relations is obviously odiosum for the women, but favorabile for the men; and if a statute gives the rights of full age on attainment of the age of twenty-one, it is favorabile in comparison with the common law, in so far as people of full age can do many acts which minors have not the capacity to do, but it is odiosum in so far as it withdraws the rights of minority on the close of the twenty-first year.⁷ What is favourable to him upon whom any right is conferred, seems to be unfavourable to him who is bound to respect or to satisfy the legal right so created.

Others writers reject the division into statuta personalia, realia, and mixta, but follow the principles of the division, as Heinrich v. Coechei, Hert, and Hofacker. Their starting-point is, that persons are subject to the laws of their native country, things to the laws of the place where they are situated, and acts to the laws of the place where they are entered upon. The distinction is only a nominal one.

If one puts out of sight these subordinate differences, the object for which the writers of this period strive is this: to discover the principle of distinction between various kinds of statutes. It is obvious to them that there is a threefold manner of subjection to the law of any territory: first, in so far as the individual has his domicile there; secondly, in so far as he possesses property there; and thirdly, in so far as he enters upon transactions there. Thereupon it seems to them, at the first glance, that there is nothing more natural than to make the individual subject to the laws of his home, property to the laws of the place where it is situated, and transactions to the laws of the place in which they are entered upon. The difficulty, however, lies here, that a law which deals with the legal capacity of the individual and his status prescribes at the same time the conditions under which he may acquire and convey property, and enter upon legal transactions. To solve their doubts, some, such as Burgundus and D'Aguesseau, wished to take as the rule for distinction the words of the statute, in the same way as Bartolus, who has been so much blamed for it, had already done.⁸

⁶ Barthol. de Saliceto, and after his time others, e.g. Dassel ad consult. Luneburgenses, c. 9.

Others have recourse to considerations of practical utility or to authorities; and others, a very small minority, make it their object to ascertain the true scope of the statute. Duplessis takes this course (Consult. 26, t. ii. Oeuvres, pp. 151, 152), although, upon the whole, he is inclined to follow the more superficial definition of D'Argentré: "Une attention exacte sur la nature, l'objet et le motif de chaque statut en particulier est souvent le moyen le plus propre pour déterminer si c'est la réalité ou la personnalité qui y domine; s'il suit la personne ou s'il est renfermé dans les bornes du territoire." And again (Consult. 47, t. ii. p. 299): "Ce qui caractérise un statut personnel, c'est quand il concerne directement l'intérêt de la personne, et non pas la conservation de la chose, si ce n'est d'une manière subordonnée et relative à la personne, il faut, que le motif, qui l'a introduit soit fondé principalement sur la condition des personnes pour lesquelles il est fait."

It is to be noted that a decisive importance is attributed to the motive of the statute, and whether it has been enacted with a view to persons or to property; and, in isolated instances, a distinction of the same kind is to be found taken by other authors, although it is not at all in keeping with the principles which they postulate. D'Argentré, for instance, thus treats the question, whether the prohibition of donations between married persons is a real or a personal law, pronouncing it to be the latter so long as he is engaged with the prohibition of the Roman law, and the former in connec-

D'Aguesseau, Oeuvres, T. V. S., p. 281. Le véritable principe en cette matière est, qu'il faut distinguer, si le statut a directement les biens pour objet—ou si au contraire, toute l'attention de la loi s'est portée vers la personne, pour décider en général de son habilité ou de sa capacité générale et absolue. This view is quite distinct; but to demonstrate its falsity more clearly, take the version of the author of the French Repertory of Jurisprudence. Voce Autorisation Maritale, § 10, No. 2: "Pour juger, si un statut est réel ou personnel, il ne faut pas en considérer les effets éloignés, les conséquences ultérieures: autrement comme il n'y a pas de statut personnel, qui ne produise un effet quelconque par rapport aux biens, ni de statut réel qui n'agisse par contre-coup sur les personnes, il faudrait dire, qu'il n'y ait point de statut, qui ne soit pas tout à la fois et personnel et réel; ce qui serait absurde et tendrait à établir une guerre ouverte entre les coutumes: que faut il donc faire? Il faut s'attacher à l'objet principal, direct et immédiat de la loi et oublier ses effets." So the thing to be considered is, not the general scope of the statute, but the subject with which its letter deals.

tion with the corresponding title of the "Contumes." He says: "Finis prohibendarum donationum conjugalium habet personales quasdam considerationes, quod leges 1 and 2 D. de donat. inter virum et uxorem indicant, et quia diversi generis donationibus non eadem leges positæ sunt, sed Consuetudinariae causæ de prohibendis his sumuntur potius a rebus, gentili pecunia et propagatione familiarum, quæ res reales sunt, non ut illæ juris Romani a personis sumtæ—cum dispositio prohibitiva res potius respicit et hæredum æternam in immobilibus successionem."

This distinction between the prohibition of these donations in Roman law, which had for its object the purity of the married life, and the prohibition in German law of the alienation of the family property by a husband in favour of his wife, touches the true point; and it is illustrated by the fact that all the writers who take German law as the starting-point from which to discuss the conflict of laws, treat this prohibition as a real statute, while those who are more familiar with Roman law regard it as personal.

If the rules laid down by the adherents of the theory of statuta personalia, realia, and mixta are examined in detail, they are found to correspond in a very few points, and this correspondence is, upon closer examination, often found to be merely apparent. There is no real substantial ground of classification to take up. It is quite true that a conflict of laws occurs, because persons by virtue of their domicile belong to a particular jurisdiction; that things, again, belong to a jurisdiction determined by their local situation; and transactions stand in what looks like a natural and close relation to the law that is recognised in the place where they are entered upon. But granting so much, all that has been disclosed is the state of facts in which the rules of international law find their origin; the principle of law that is to give rise to these rules has not been reached. The real and substantial principle can only be found by looking back upon the nature of the connection between a person, a thing, and transaction, on the one side, and a State and its laws, on the other.

It was thought sufficient, in the various cases that occurred, to postulate the application of the laws of the domicile of the person, or of the local situation of the thing, or of the place where the act was done. And in this way not only did the adherents of this theory contradict one another, but as their rules—although common-sense often led them to sound conclusions—were at bottom quite arbitrary, each author often fell into plain contradictions of his own determinations, as Wächter has clearly pointed out.⁹

Lastly, let it be remarked that, although the later Middle Ages often placed capricious limitations upon the legal capacities of foreigners, yet as time went on, and especially in the eighteenth century, the tendency to let these limitations more and more fall away is making itself felt.

INDIVIDUAL WRITERS OF THIS PERIOD.

§ 20. It will be useful to subject the different authors of this period to a short review. We shall at present not go further into details than is necessary to exhibit the true meaning of the general principles adopted by each author; the details will be considered subsequently, when we come to discuss particular chapters of law. The technical expressions used by authors in this subject have so many different meanings, that the points of agreement and of difference of the various authors will be made plainer to the reader by this separate treatment of them, than if the adherents of each doctrine were grouped together as that doctrine is taken up.

OLDER FRENCH JURISTS (DUMOULIN, D'ARGENTRÉ).

Dumoulin (Molinaeus),¹ (1500-1566), has exercised² a considerable influence upon later French jurisprudence, although the subject of the conflict of laws is only taken up by him by the way, and is not dealt with in a large connected treatise. He is, however, pre-eminently a Romanist, and is therefore under the influence of the Italian school. This explains his inclination to find personal statutes even in the provisions of the French Coutumes.³ But one must admit that he knows how to meet the traditions, which on this point are very often against him, and it is a point of novelty which we find in him, that he shows that the Roman law is certainly not the common law of France, in the face of which one would have to regard the Coutumes as merely restrictive statutes, with no effect beyond their own territory. He shows, on the contrary, that, in so far as the conflict of laws is concerned, the Coutumes in comparison with the Roman law are of an equal value, and are of just as much effect in questions beyond their own territory.⁴ Another novelty with him is the energetic emphasis he lays on the intention of parties, the operation of which is not to be limited to any particular territory. This observation is in itself correct, but at the same time it leads him to see implied contracts, where the only question is a question of the direct operation of a statute, an operation which may no doubt be excluded or modified by an express arrangement of the parties. Thus Dumoulin certainly presents many points of contrast with the most modern French school. On this account Laurent holds him specially worthy of notice; but Laurent himself does not fail to notice the caprice of many of his arguments, and in particular the meaningless use of the distinction between the Statutum favorabile and the Statutum odiosum, a distinction which, however, was not invented by him.

³ Coquille in a later day, d. 1603, went even further in this direction in a logical fashion. See on him Laurent, i. § 285.

U. C. B. D'Argentré (1519-1590)⁵ stands in strong contrast with Molinæus. He treats of the conflict of laws in his Commentary upon the Customs of Brittany, in connection with the 218th article of these customs, which runs as follows:—

“Toute personne pourvue de sens peut donner le tiers de son héritage a autres qu'à ses hoirs, au cas qu'elle ne ferait pas fraude contre ses hoirs.”

Our author inquires, in his commentary on this article, whether the same rule is to be applied to real property in another country belonging to a Breton.

The rules of the “ Coutumes de Bretagne ” are the rules which Argentré has exclusively in view in the course of his discussion of the conflict of laws, and these consist for the most part of rules of the older German law or of feudal law;⁶ it follows, therefore, that Argentré's conclusions can only be very cautiously applied to the rules and institutes of common law. But if one has the skill to discriminate between the institutes of German law, which are especially in his view, and these more general principles, the accuracy of his conclusions on different isolated points will, in spite of the falsity that often affects his premises, be easily appreciated. According to Argentré, every legal relation of immoveables is determined by real statutes, the lex rei sitæ; but every rule, the whole of which affects a person, is a personal statute, and can only be applied in accordance with the law of that person's domicile. Where the question is as to the competency or incompetency of a person to perform a particular act, the statute there is a statutum mixtum, which is treated by Argentré just as a real statute. This definition, and the conclusion which he founds thereon, are undoubtedly general rules drawn by him from the particular case that is then under his notice—viz. the obligation, drawn from German law and found in Brittany, upon married persons to bestow their property upon each other for the benefit of their next heirs. At the same time, Argentré follows the rule, “ Mobilia ossibus inharrent ” (No. 31), and applies to moveables the rules of law that hold good in the domicile of the owner.

We can trace the origin of this theory in the way previously indicated. The legislator of the domicile of any person can, says Argentré, make what provisions he pleases for that person, and, on account of the character so imposed upon him, that power of the legislature follows that person where-ever he goes ; on the other hand, however, the legislator can make no rules for immoveables which are not in his territory ; and from this principle Argentré goes on to infer that, if a statute provides that a donation shall only be good to the extent of one-third of the donor's property, real property in a foreign country can never be taken into account in computing this third, because the legislator had neither the intention nor the power of making law for anything but immoveables situated in his own country.

⁵ On him see again Laurent, i. § 275.

It has already been remarked that the theory of personal and real statutes by no means follows from the principles which Argentré assumes (p. 30) ; it is obvious that it entirely fails to supply a principle for the division into statuta realia, personalia, and mixta, the last of which are simply treated as real statutes. One cannot help, however, admiring the fine practical sense with which, as we shall see in the sequel, Argentré manages to hit the truth in particular cases in spite of his inadequate theory. Otherwise Argentré occupies himself mainly with the law of persons, the law of succession, and the law of married persons' property. Real rights and the law of contracts are scarcely touched by him.

JURISTS OF THE NETHERLANDS (BURGUNDUS, RODENBURG, P. VOET, HUBER, J. VOET) THE GERMAN HERT.

Burgundus⁷ (1586-1649) is an adherent of the statute theory, which he rests on the same foundation as Argentré. It is not quite clear what general rule Burgundus means to lay down for distinguishing real and personal statutes. He rejects the well-known determination of Bartolus in reference to the conflict of a statute regulating the law of primogeniture with the common law, and prefers to direct his attention to considering whether the provisions of a statute with regard to the conditio of a person are laid down in dispositione or in enunciatione. According to other passages, again, every legal relation that imposes an obligation is a personal statute ; a real statute is one that gives rise to a real action ; and a mixed statute one which gives rise to both a personal and a real action. In so far, then, as real rights in immoveables are concerned—the law as to moveables being determined by the domicile of the owner (i. §§ 40-43, iv. § 26)—the law of the place where the thing is is the ruling law ; but in so far as personal obligations are concerned, although these obligations may be in connection with immoveables, the law of the domicile of the person must be applied (i. § 6 et seq.). Thus there follows this strange practical result, that you may have a person who, by the law of his domicile, is a minor, with full power to grant a good conveyance of landed estate that is situated in another country, by whose law he is of full age, while he is not able to undertake a personal obligation to execute such a conveyance.⁸

⁷ On Burgundus and the authors of the Netherlands in general, see again Laurent, i. § 293 et seq.

⁸ See, on the other hand, Abraham a Wesel, ad Nov. Consuet. Ultraj., Art. 13, No. 25 ; Merlin, Rép. Vo. Majorité, § 5, On ne concevra jamais, comment une tradition faite sans titre et sans aucune cause peut être valable.

To this Burgundus adds the proposition (iv. § 7), that the laws of the place where any legal transaction is carried out are the authority that must regulate the forms of the contract: "Nam ut personæ, quamdiu in territorio versantur, ejusdem legibus sunt obnoxie, ita et actus personales—citra mentem consuetudinis iniri non possunt."

In two cases Burgundus reaches his determination by considering the scope of the statute; in treating of donation and succession between spouses, where he decides in agreement with Argentræus (i. No. 40); and again, subsequently, in some discussions upon the law of obligation (ii. Nos. 23, 24), where he attaches importance to the fact whether the statute was passed in favorem debitoris or creditoris. It is easy to see that this theory is entirely arbitrary and inconsequent. The distinction, however, between immediate real rights in a thing, and the personal obligations undertaken in respect thereof, is worth attention; although Burgundus makes far too extensive a use of it, as the instance given above of his opinion that the capacity of disposing of a thing depends upon the lex rei sitæ shows.

Rodenburg, too (1618-1668), founds the theory of statuta personalia, realia, and mixta upon the proposition that the legislator cannot lay down rules for things that are situated in a foreign country, or for persons who are domiciled there (Tit. i. cap. 3, No. 1), although he is forced to admit that it is possible to lay down such rules indirectly (l. c. No. 5).⁹ Personal statutes, according to Rodenburg's view, confer on the person a quality that adheres to him; otherwise, a man might be a minor in one place, and of full age in another.

Rodenburg defines the statutum mixtum in the same way as Burgundus; but in the application of this definition he is very far from agreeing with him; interpreting the restrictions upon the alienation of a minor's estate by the lex domicilii of the minor, instead of referring them, like Burgundus, to the lex rei sitæ. Upon the whole, Rodenburg holds to the words of the statute—"Quid in dispositionem statuti ceciderit"—without caring to consider, "qua ratione cujusve personæ intuitu," the law may have been enacted; but yet he has a strong argument upon the intention of the legislator, and on the question whether he had persons or things in view (Tit. ii. p. 2, cap. 4, § 5). In this connection, Rodenburg lays down the proposition, "Mobilia personam sequuntur" (Tit. ii. p. 1, cap. 2, § 1; ii. p. 1, cap. 5, § 16), but without fully realising the consequences of this maxim, as will appear on consulting the passage last cited.

Rodenburg's researches, which set out from a discussion of the rights of married persons, and are therefore principally directed to the questions of the capacity, succession, and property of married persons, and have but little concern with the law of contracts, are yet sorely deficient, like those of Argentré and Burgundus, in a substantial and consecutive ground plan, although in many isolated points they are acute and subtle. For instance, Rodenburg carries out logically the distinction between personal and real grounds of action in the sphere of married persons' property, a distinction already made, no doubt, by Burgundus, but thrust too much into the foreground by him. The great collection of actual cases, in which the decisions of the law courts of France and the Netherlands are given, favourably distinguishes this work.

The work of P. Voet (1619-1677) on the statutes deals with our subject in sections 4, 9, 11.

Taking the division into statuta personalia, realia, and mixta as fundamental, he goes on to deduce from the independence of different territories this result—that a personal statute, strictly construed, will not affect subjects of a State who are temporarily absent in another State; while, at the same time, no legislator can lay down rules for foreigners who happen to be for a time in his dominions, as regards their essential characteristics—i.e. their capacity or incapacity. From this it follows that the legal capacity of these foreigners is not to be determined either by our law or by the law of their home.

With Voet, upon the whole, a more accurate conception of the independence of different territories leads to complete confusion, so that his true meaning is in many cases hardly discoverable, and nothing is left to him at last, when juristic considerations are exhausted, but an appeal to the humanitas and comitas of other Powers. It may be conceded, however, that Voet very often hits the truth, but certainly not because of the grounds on which he relies, for these, on the contrary, may often be turned against him.

With Huber (1636-1694), even more conspicuously than with Voet, the independence of different territories comes to the front. The laws of a State, as Huber lays down at the very outset of his inquiry, have no force except within that State; but they are good there for all persons who are found within it. The strictness of this axiom is only modified by the friendly intercourse that exists among the different States, and by the comitas which they observe; in consequence whereof, the application of foreign laws is permitted, in so far as it is not repugnant to the supremacy of the sovereign power in our State and the rights of our subjects.

According to Huber's view, it is consistent with these principles that the laws of the place where any legal transaction is entered upon should determine its validity, just as the qualities of persons, which are stamped upon them in the same way, should be determined by the law of their domicile, while all the legal relations of immoveables should be settled by the laws of the place where the thing is. In obedience to the last rule, Huber applies the lex rei sitæ, not only to testate and intestate succession in immoveables, but even to contracts that have to do with immoveables.

It is plain that Hubert's theory cannot be deduced from the principles which he postulates. The first principle has only a negative force, and the second, as it is understood by Huber, is no doubt well fitted to demonstrate the motives by which the application of foreign laws is, as a general rule, determined, but cannot supply any solution for individual problems.

The clearness and brevity with which Huber speaks give his work a notable advantage. Besides that, in his character of Essenator supremæ curiæ Frisiæ, he communicates to his readers cases that have actually been decided.

All that need be said of the theory of Hert (1652-1710) has been said already. The validity of the lex domicilii, in relation to the status and capacity of persons, he attempts to establish upon the consideration that the sway of a State over foreigners is confined to the transactions they enter upon in its dominions, or to the immoveables which they possess there. Only, if the transactions of foreigners entered upon in our country are to be subject to the authority of our State, it is difficult to see how their persons are not also to be made subject to it while they remain in our State.

It is worth remarking that Hert (sect. iv. §§ 31, 32) introduces jus naturale to settle some cases; but it is not clear what he understands thereby as regards the rights of different territories.

J. Voet (1647-1714) is conspicuous by a trenchant and logical adherence to the idea of an exclusive sovereign and legislative authority in each separate territory. He lays down that in strict law no appeal can be made in a foreign court to the lex domicilii as determining the status and capacity of a person. Voet is therefore of opinion that, except in so far as special exceptions have been accorded by the free permission of the authority of the State, the judge, who can only carry out the will of his own State, must apply none but the law of his own country. He treats as such exceptions, sanctioned by long practice, the rules that moveables are regularly judged by the law of the domicile of the persons that own them, and the external forms of a legal transaction by the laws of the place where it is entered upon (§§ 11-15). Voet cannot therefore be charged with illegitimate deductions, but it may be asked whether it is correct to say that all theories are insufficient, and that it is necessary to appeal to such a universal practice. At the same time, the exception, which Voet in the ultimate results of his theory wishes to introduce by the assumption that, where no prohibitory laws stand in the way, the application of foreign law to any contract on which they may be entering depends upon the will of the parties themselves, is, from his own point of view, improper; for, by his own theory, with the exception of the special cases sanctioned by usage, all laws are prohibitory, and if they permit in this or that legal relation any pacta that parties may desire, then, in the case of such a bargain, we are no longer concerned with the solution of a conflict of laws, but with the interpretation of the will of the parties. Voet, however, confounds the immediate statutory consequences of a transaction with the case of a tacit agreement, an inexact manner of thought which enables him to escape from some consequences of his principles ; as, for instance, in the subject of the property of married persons, in which he bases the general validity of the lex domicilii of the spouses upon a tacit agreement. Besides the chapter specially devoted to the conflict of laws, Voet, in the other parts of his Commentary on the Pandects, gives many other judgments on different points which certainly are often irreconcilable with the exclusion of foreign laws which he postulates, but are at the same time conspicuous for the clearness and precision peculiar to this writer, and for his fine practical instinct.

FRENCH AND GERMAN AUTHORS OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY (BOUHIER, BOULLENOIS, ALEF, HOFÆKER).

In the works of Bouhier¹⁰ (1673-1746), the theory of real and personal statutes assumes a peculiar shape.

While he assigns as grounds for the application of foreign laws the goodwill that different nations bear to one another, and the general benefits that result from it, he lays down the following rules:—

1. Every statute which deals with incorporeal and indivisible rights is personal; that is to say, is valid beyond the territory for which it is enacted.

2. The same property is to be ascribed to a statute which rests upon a tacit or an express agreement of parties, and also

3. To a statute which, out of considerations of public policy, lays some restraint upon all persons who are domiciled in the dominions of the State.

4. Lastly, every statute is personal to the effect described, which enacts formalities for a legal instrument (chap. 23, Nos. 14-39). All other statutes Bouhier regards as real, and only valid within the territory for which they are made ; but to this he has to add (chap. 23, Nos. 90, 91)—

(a.) The personal statute, which is permissive, is to be subordinate to the real statute, which forbids.

(b.) The personal statute of the domicile is to be preferred to the personal statute of the place where the thing is situated.

One can at once discover that the leading rules quoted above are only abstractions from particular cases, and are not universally applied even by Bouhier. For instance, by the first rule indivisible servitudes over heritage would belong to the class of personal statutes, although Bouhier himself (chap. 29, No. 29) admits that the reverse is true. In spite of this fundamental error, his work is rich in valuable inquiries into details.

The work of Boullenois¹¹ (1680-1768), which is very comprehensive and ¹⁰ On Bouhier see Laurent, i. § 351 et seq.

is entirely devoted to the conflict of laws, furnishes a continuous commentary upon Rodenburg's treatise, and gives in its adherence to the principles there laid down, which Boullenois subordinates to the leading principle of the common good of nations (i. p. 49). It is remarkable that although Boullenois, like Rodenburg, in classifying statutes lays stress upon the words of the enactments, he does not leave their motive out of sight.

His accurate treatment of details, his comprehensive acquaintance with the various forms of French customs and usages, the delicate tests which he applies to the decisions of the French courts, which are copiously cited by him, and, besides all this, the independence with which he criticises the results obtained by Rodenburg, although, upon the whole, he adopts them, give Boullenois's work a permanent value: there is, however, often a discursive reasoning, losing itself in vague conclusions, that disturbs this favourable impression.

Among the many dissertations devoted to our subject, or more or less connected with it, that of Alef (d. 1763, Prof. in Heidelberg) is worth remark. The author assails, first of all, the ordinary statute theory. He points out how divergent the opinions of authors are as to whether this or that statute is to be reckoned in this or that class. The distinction between statutes, in the ordinary sense, must be in the end sought for in the words of the enactment, and these must give way to the will of the legislator; for it cannot be that a statute should, for example, be held to have a different meaning and a different effect, according as it should on the one hand refuse to its subjects the capacity of testing upon their property, or on the other provide that an estate should only be transmitted ab intestato. Accurately considered, an enactment can never be said to have regard merely to lifeless things, but must always be directed to the legal relations of persons in connection with these things.

If these attacks upon the ordinary statute theory are clearly laid down, the same cannot be said of Alef's own theory. Proceeding on the axiom that the power of the State, on the one side, must always be paramount within its own territory, and, on the other, must always be confined to it, Alef deduces the application of the law of the country to the status and capacity of foreigners, and to the forms of legal contracts made in the country (Nos. 28-31), and demands that, in the case of contracts, the laws of the domiciles of the contracting parties, and the laws of the land in which the contract is made, should be recognised in reference to the question of capacity. The objection to this doctrine—viz. that by it the laws of the domiciles will have effect given to them outside their own territory, since it is possible that an act valid by the laws of a foreign country may be by them declared invalid—is attempted to be met by Alef with this observation, which is undoubtedly wrong, that the incapacity of a person for any transaction is something purely negative, and that therefore the validity of the law of the domicile need not be invoked to maintain it. It is plain that this theory is not only incomplete, for he has hardly anything to say of rights of property, but rests entirely on arbitrary assumptions, the results of which stand in open contradiction to well-known necessities of commerce and actual fact.

The other writings of this period that touch upon our subject contain, upon the whole, mere repetitions of doctrines drawn from those already mentioned. Any views worth notice, that may be found here and there, will be discussed hereafter when we come to treat of the various legal doctrines; we need only mention that, according to Hofeeker's treatise (De Efficacia), the express will of the legislator, or that will as it may be discovered by construction of his laws, to which the judge who pronounces on any case is subject, is to rule, and, in subsidium, he proposes to appeal to the Roman law. But, since Hofeeker (1749-1793) does not give any more exact principles for such an interpretation of laws, and besides, as Wächter has pointed out (ii. p. 20), loses himself when he comes to details, his axiom, which is undoubtedly true, cannot be considered of any very great importance.

D. THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

THE Code Civil AND THE FRENCH JURISPRUDENCE WHICH RESTS ON IT.

§ 21. By the eighteenth century the statute theory was already in course of dissolution.¹ One indication of this is the hesitation and doubt which the different authors have in defining the classes of statutes, some defining them by their effects; some by considering whether in a particular case a statute should be applied as the native law of the person or the law of the thing, or the law of the transaction; some by the arrangement of the rules of law in the system of law under consideration; and some by the intention of the lawgiver. Another indication, however, is the circumstance that the decisions of authors on particular controversies are becoming more and more independent of the categories of this theory of the statutes.

It is, however, conceivable that this theory, by the strength of tradition, even apart from its resuscitation by the most modern Italian school, for a time should still assert for itself a kind of continued existence. It is found in the works belonging to the jurisprudence of England and of the United States, but merely as an embellishment: ² German jurisprudence was the first to get rid of it, and did so more completely than any other; it is in French jurisprudence that it still has most real meaning. The explanation is that, although the French legislator has not expressly adopted the theory of the statutes, the authors of the Code Civil certainly started from it in combination with earlier French jurisprudence. If we are to take the view that not merely the words of the law, but the theory by which the legislator has reached these words, are to have the force of law, then the statute theory is still recognised as law in France.³

² Calvo, however, takes a more serious view of it, ii. §§ 921 et seq. (ii. §§ 706 et seq. of the 4th edition).

Fœlix (1791-1853) is most closely allied to the writers who attach themselves to the theory of the statutes. He starts with this principle: that, in consequence of the sovereign power that belongs to each State, the application of foreign laws may be entirely excluded; and where it is admitted, it rests upon a voluntary and friendly concession by the sovereign power, out of regard to the mutual advantages of such a course—upon the comitas nationum, as earlier writers called it. Then, without an attempt to discover any general principle for this comitas, and rejecting all universal axioms, especially the older theory of statuta realia, personalia, and mixta, he confines the task of any author on the subject to this: that he shall classify the recognised cases in which foreign law is to be applied, in conformity with recorded decisions and the views of different authors; shall pronounce what the usage is; and shall extend that usage to analogous cases. He takes, however, the division of laws into statuta personalia, realia, and mixta, as a starting-point, not because he considers that division exhaustive, but because it is practically useful, and, taken up as it was by earlier authors, has been of real use in the historical development of the view that is recognised by himself (i. §. 20); abandoning any attempt to define personalia and realia—for the definition which he gives, viz. that personal statutes are those that follow the individual wherever he goes, while real statutes have no force beyond a particular territory, is a mere formal description to illustrate their operation—he includes among the statuta personalia or realia those laws which have been assigned to the one class or the other by the majority of earlier authors, although with the widest differences in detail; and among statuta mixta he includes not merely the laws which deal with the legal aspects of business dealings generally, but also those which relate to procedure and to crime, because these laws are to be considered as the consequences of men's dealings with each other.

If Fœlix's theory is to be adopted,⁴ he has no doubt carried it out consistently by stringing together the different cases that have been assigned to these three kinds of statutes, without any inner or real link among them, as well as by referring to the numerous passages, collected with extraordinary care, which he cites, and the unanimity of authorities and of judicial determinations therein demonstrated. But if this unanimity, which Fœlix so often assumes, is more closely examined, it often turns out that he has had no regard for the grounds of the opinion or judgment which he cites, but only for the result of that opinion or judgment upon the particular case; and besides that in such cases a more searching examination will frequently reveal contradictions, it is inevitable that the reader should feel convinced that the whole system of private international law consists of isolated and arbitrary postulates, and has no scientific foundation to rest upon at all. By the division of the subject he has adopted, we find, in the first place, that the laws which deal with procedure and with crime, in which the public law of a sovereign State may be conspicuously exhibited, are treated under the inadequate conception of a consequence of men's dealings with each other, a conception which would include most things that are to be found in man's existence; and, in the second place, that it is much more difficult to discover the true meaning of the author. Except in his treatment of the law of procedure, which is the most successful part of the treatise, there is no division of his work that corresponds with the ordinary systems of positive law; and the reader is consequently forced to inquire under which of Fœlix's artificial definitions any case must be reduced, before he can discover where he is to find a discussion of it.⁵

⁴ Laurent, i. § 404, gives a sharp criticism of the principles on which Fœlix founds, if indeed they deserve that name, and should not rather be called a mixture of arbitrary and in part self-contradictory rules. But we must not forget that Fœlix was the first Frenchman who, after a long interval, treated of private international law in a great consecutive work, and that a diligent compiler need not be an original genius.

In spite of this defect, the work was at one time in many respects of the greatest value, owing to the numerous citations and decisions, and the positive enactments that are adduced—and there are here set out concisely and plainly the legal principles of almost all civilised States on private and criminal international law—and by his interpretation of positive enactments of French law in their international relations the author has done excellent service. Now, however, the work is out of date, although reference is still often made to it, and it need only be taken into particular account for the extensive and acute notes with which Demangeat, after the author's death, furnished the new editions.^{6 7}

Massé (1807-1881) proceeds similarly to Fœlix. In him we miss any general principle. He asserts that in each case convenience and justice must determine the application of foreign law. He disputes at the same time the right of the State to exclude the application of foreign law from its territory, without, however, denying the force of express enactments to that effect (No. 48). He takes for a foundation the well-known division of statutes in its ordinary acceptation, and, although he declares himself opposed to the class of statuta mixta, and to the rule mobilia personam sequuntur, his difficulty is purely verbal, and is not seriously argued out. It is, for instance, a petitio principii to say (No. 55), "Il est manifeste, que la capacité d'un individu celle, qui derive de sa position, ne peut être déterminée que par les lois de la société, dont il fait partie." His discussion of the law of obligations is disturbed by the definitions he adopts from Fœlix, which are artificial, and in part, as we shall hereafter see, untenable; as, for instance, the division of the results of a contract into foreseen and unforeseen, and of its form into external and internal, definitions and terms which even at the present day play an important part in French jurisprudence.

On isolated points, however, his work, which is of considerable detail, and is most closely associated with French law, contains many valuable investigations, and especially in the subject of procedure, which is discussed with interest and accuracy. The division that deals with the forms of process, a subject that is for the most part neglected by German authors, might in its day have been called remarkably good.

THE POSITIVISTS OF ENGLAND AND THE UNITED STATES.

§ 22. Authors in England and the United States, and in particular Wheaton, Burge, and Story, take their stand as much as Fœlix, and even more, upon pure positivism.

At the same time, the whole of this English and American school of jurisprudence is characterised by a manifold and conspicuous opposition to the jurisprudence of the European continent, and of those countries that lie under the influence of the French school.

On the one side, the English and American jurisprudence gives a much wider extension to the application of the lex rei sitæ in questions of family and succession law, in so far as immoveable property is involved in these questions. On the other hand, it is inclined, in dealing with the effects of a legal transaction, to allow the law of the place, where the transaction was entered into, to rule the question exclusively, and to leave out of account the law of the domicile of the persons concerned, even where their personal capacity may be in dispute. The former of these two points of opposition is connected with that feudal foundation for the law of real property, effects of which are still felt, although it is disappearing from day to day, and the result of which is gross falsity; the latter of the two depends upon a certain exaggerated idea of territorial sovereignty. Alongside of these influences, a certain inclination to decide particular cases on grounds of expediency makes itself felt in countries where the system of utilitarianism has its home. In this it is forgotten that these grounds of expediency, if they are viewed too much as the only grounds of decision, are treacherous in their very nature, and besides it is overlooked that a much greater evil for the intercourse of nations is often to be found in varying decisions upon the same persons and the same legal relations, than lies in a certain measure of concession in recognising the operation of foreign rules of law even within the territory of domestic law.^{1 2}

Wheaton (1785-1848) dedicates but a small division of his work—about 50 pages—to international law; his plan is almost that of Fœlix, except that he avoids attaching himself to the statute theory.

A discussion so short, and one which evades questions of principle and proceeds upon a vague and flexible notion of comitas, has at the best little value.³

Burge, too, declines to enunciate a general principle, and commits the decision of particular questions to the instinct of the lawyer (i. p. 11). No doubt he lays down a number (31) of particular rules (p. 25), but these propositions—mainly borrowed from Boullenois, and, although quite unconnected and founded upon many different theories, still assumed to be capable of immediate application—contain nothing but specialities, and, as may be suspected from this description of them, are often self-contradictory. But yet this most comprehensive work, consisting for the most part of a comparison of the different systems of law that are recognised throughout the British Empire, is remarkable for the astounding knowledge of the most various systems of law and of legislation displayed by the author, for the wealth of legal cases and decisions that are cited and criticised with acuteness and great independence, and for many excellent discussions of different questions.⁴ In these discussions, Burge can use the considerations on which the laws of the different States rest most skilfully in reference to their international relation, although the treatment is not always consistent,⁵ and instead of juridical principles, he has to invoke the assistance of considerations of expediency and general approbation.⁶

Story (d. 1845) avoids any statement of a general principle—a matter on which there is perpetual discord—and, like Burge, proposes merely to illustrate, criticise, and establish more decidedly the law that is recognised (§ 16). He only avails himself of the expressions, statutum personale, reale, ¹ See Laurent's criticism (i. § 381 et seq.), which is keen, and in many respects excellent, but often too exaggerated.

² There is observable, in the very most recent times, more approximation in England and the United States to the jurisprudence of the European continent.

³ For Beach-Lawrence's commentary on Wheaton, see below.

⁴ See, for example, the discussion on the conflict of laws on the question of marriage.

⁵ See, for example, i. p. 132, and i. p. 210, where different determinations are given upon the personal capacity for legal acts.

and mixtum, to describe the effects of particular statutes; and as he develops the principle of the paramount supremacy of every State in its own territory to its logical conclusions, he deduces the application of the laws of other countries from provisions to that effect in the laws of the country that allows them to be applied. Such provisions, which must often be put into practice by reason of the mutual profit of the various States, may be, he says, inferred although not expressed; and it is only when foreign laws are at variance with the interest of the home country that they are universally admitted to be inapplicable.

Story, then, as far as the leading features of his theory are concerned, is an adherent of Huber, but in details is highly independent. As may well be understood, he adheres very closely to the American and English Common Law in enunciating his own views, but he does not fail to take into view the grounds that foreign authors, especially the older authors, have assigned in support of this or that theory; at the same time, there is no attempt at an historical development of the subject. He gives in a masterly fashion very many reports of interesting cases decided in England and America, setting forth the facts and circumstances of each most clearly, and criticising with great subtlety the details of the grounds of judgment in each. This is most conspicuous in his treatment of the subject of "foreign contracts"—a subject that includes the greater part of the law of obligations, and seems, as a very important division of the whole, to be treated con amore.

Less successful, however, are his discussions on procedure; and when he comes to deal with the important questions of capacity of persons and their status, and also of marriage, the want of one leading principle makes itself very much felt, and in these questions the only resource for the author often comes to be, that he shall betake himself to mere utility, or to the very obvious proposition, that every nation may or may not permit foreign laws to be applied, as it thinks best.

On the other hand, the practical division of the subject deserves recognition;⁷ it is not made according to artificial definitions, but according to legal categories, although this division is not always strictly maintained, and one can often note a tendency to diverge to other departments of law, just as the definitions which he lays down are very often wanting in sharpness.

The student will lay down this book with an enlarged knowledge of decided cases, and of the opinions of different authors, and the judge will often be glad to test the case in hand by the help of Story's numerous illustrations and his wondrous power of comparison, and will find profit in doing so; but it will often be difficult for a reader to say from Story's discussion of a subject that the decision must, on legal principle, be what he pronounces it to be, and none other.

⁷ His treatment of criminal international law is very scanty, only occupying ten pages out of eight hundred, and the difficulties of this subject he seems to avoid.

THE LEADING RULES ESTABLISHED BY GERMAN JURISTS.

§ 23. It is among German authors that we meet again for the first time the attempt to solve the question of private international law on a uniform general principle. On the other hand, the first want we feel is a want of monographs dedicated to the subject of private international law: these are comparatively rare in German juristic literature, which in other departments is so rich. We must, therefore, first look at the treatises on Roman civil law and German private law.

Eichhorn (D. Privatrecht, § 27), Thibaut (Pand. § 38), and Göschel (Civilr. i. p. 111),¹ hold that the law recognised in the native country of the person concerned supplies a general rule for him. This conception seems at first sight to be a very natural one in reference to private law, with which these authors are alone concerned. "Every right seems at first to be a power that belongs to the individual, and so a property of the individual. Proceeding from this as our original point of view, we have to consider legal relations as attributes of the individual" (Savigny, § 345, Guthrie, p. 55). But, as has been pointedly remarked by Wächter (ii. p. 10), although the subject of one country may consider himself, when he is abroad, as bound by the laws of his domicile, it does not by any means follow that he must be judged according to these laws when he is brought before the foreign judge. The principle is seen to be quite inadequate, if it is remembered that most of the questions of private law are concerned with the legal spheres of two persons, who may be subjects of different States, with different laws: the consequence would be the adoption of the system of personal laws, as in the Middle Ages.² In practice, Eichhorn cannot carry out his principle consistently. By a second axiom (§ 36), that, in so far as the rights of an individual have their origin without his domicile, or are to be exercised there, they stand in need of the protection of foreign laws, and that this can only be extended to them under certain conditions, his first axiom becomes indefinite, and cannot recover a definite meaning, as will shortly be shown, even although this additional rule be called in to its aid—viz. that vested rights are to be recognised everywhere.³

This last principle, which had been taken up in the eighteenth century by e.g. Titius,⁴ appears in the nineteenth century for the most part merely as a subsidiary principle, although one of some weight. Besides Eichhorn, Glück (Pand. i. pp. 400, 401) and Maurenbrecher (D. Privatr. i. § 144) use it.⁵

² Wächter, ii. 12; Savigny, viii. § 345, Guthrie, p. 55.

³ The likeness between this view and that of the new Italian school will not be overlooked.

⁴ Jur. priv. Romani Germani, lib. xii. lib. i. tit. iv. p. ii. de statutis.

It cannot, of course, be denied that the legal intercourse of persons belonging to different States is only possible, if it is admitted that persons and things must be recognised in a foreign country as the subjects and the objects of vested rights.⁶ But the proposition in this plain form yields us, it may well be said, no principle of practical use. In manifold aspects it is true that one State recognises and protects vested rights which have been acquired in another, but as Savigny (p. 132, § 361, Guthrie, p. 147) has observed, the answer to the question whether a right is truly a vested right, postulates that it is already determined by what law the acquisition or vesting is to be judged, and thus the principle so set out runs in a circle.

The principle set up by Schäffner comes very close to that of the maintenance of vested rights; every legal relation, as a matter of right, and without any assistance from the so-called Comitas,⁷ is to be determined by the laws of the place in which it has come into existence. Thus questions as to the legal capacity of a person are to be determined by the laws of his domicile, for the view of the law (which law?) cannot possibly go this length, that the legal capacity or status is created by a mere temporary stay in any place. As Schäffner does not explain when it is that a legal relation comes into existence, and his principle has therefore no defined meaning, so his determination in particular cases cannot be deduced from it, and many of the illustrations which he adduces can be turned right round.⁸ For instance, he says (p. 51) that the question whether a bastard can be legitimated by the subsequent marriage of its parents, is to be determined by the laws of the place where it was born, because it was here that the birth of the child as a fact took place, and the legal relation came into existence. But it may be just as well maintained that the bastard at the time of its birth stood in no legal relation to its father, and that therefore the legal relation had not at that time come into existence. Schäffner cannot help calling to his aid the spirit and tendency of the laws, the nature of the subject, and other principles (pp. 76, 65). In spite of the fact that the principle assumed by Schäffner is not in a position to solve the questions of international law, while, too, no foundation is laid for it, but it is simply postulated,⁹ yet we must not fail to notice that our author

⁶ On this subject, see below, § 32.

⁷ Schäffner describes Comitas as a haphazard and unlawyer-like principle, which proposes to decide legal questions on political considerations. G. Struve had, so far back as 1831, set up the principle that every legal relation is to be judged by the laws of the place in which it is to work itself out. This proposition might lead to a true principle (see below, § 32). But Struve himself had but a vague conception of it, and accordingly the further development of it, in his most unimportant little book, does not correspond with the start. Struve reaches the most curious results (cf. e.g. pp. 70 et seq. 90, 116, and Mohl's criticism. Geschichte und Lit. der Staatswissenschaften, i. p. 449). Struve, besides, proposes to work out his principle in so absolute a fashion as to deny the power of positive laws, which are at variance with it, to bind the judge.

⁸ See, on the other hand, Unger, Oesterr. Privatr. i. p. 160; Wächter, ii. p. 32.

in a concise way sets up a number of learned problems, and by his knowledge and the attention which he gives to the principles of English law, which often diverge widely from the common law, he is often led to excellent observations.¹⁰ The literature of the subject is very copiously used, but certainly not sufficiently thoroughly; mistaken views of other writers he often combats with success. His last chapter contains a short exposition of the law of process, in which, however, he passes over the important subject of the execution of foreign judgments.

Pütter and Pfeiffer propose in the most absolute way that the law of the judge, who is to determine any legal dispute that may have arisen, should rule. The former applies this principle so unreservedly that he is led to consequences that place the security of all international intercourse in the most serious danger; and he can only support his conclusions against generally received theories and the practice of courts of law, by the argument, that these have no clear conception of the relations of different countries in matters of public law, and draw inferences from what is recognised, or has been recognised, in the case of different systems of law within one and the same territory, for application to the case of the laws of distinct sovereign States. Pütter, however, cannot conceal from himself that, by his theory, since it is very much a matter of chance in what country a lawsuit may come to depend, if the principle stated above is to be exclusively and consistently observed, the intercourse of different States would be impossible. The fact that the commerce of the world, notwithstanding this, goes on, is, in Pütter's view, proof that the rule stated above must be correct; especially as the merchant who buys for sale, needs only to sell the goods he has bought to a third party, in order to escape all claims against him for recovery! (p. 74.) As Pütter himself sometimes surrenders his principle entirely (e.g. §§ 14, 115, and 140), and has to have recourse to the assumption that the officials of any particular State do not trouble themselves much about the laws of foreign countries, or that the testimony of a foreign judge as to the validity of a transaction entered into under the laws of his country settles all the doubts of the judge who has to decide the question, it is not to be expected that a satisfactory solution of the question should be found in his work, although, on the other hand, one may find there many excellent observations on criminal law, especially in reference to the draft of the new criminal code of Prussia (pp. 93-96).¹¹

Pfeiffer's work, as the title shows, does not go into detail. The principle already quoted is derived by him from the fact of the subjection of the judge to the law of his own country, and from the rule, for which he gives no justification, that the positive law of a State must be applied to all the ¹⁰ See, for instance, his remarks on the law of succession, p. 165.

cases that fall within it, without respect to persons or things. Pfeiffer maintains this position on the ground that knowledge of foreign law is as a rule defective, and proposes to exclude its application even where it is sought to further the intention of the parties by allowing them the assistance of a dispositive enactment recognised in some foreign country. The argument on the other side—viz. that the undeviating application of the law of the court that decides the case would allow the pursuer, as a rule, to alter at his own will the legal relations between him and the defender, by giving him the option of appealing at his own pleasure to one court or another—Pfeiffer thinks he can meet with the observation that the defender can exercise no small influence upon the jurisdiction that is to be applied, and upon the legal relations of the parties, by virtue of the power he has of choosing his domicile at his own pleasure.¹² But if the pursuer in the one case, and the defender in the other, have the power of altering capriciously the legal relations that exist between them, that still leaves the element of caprice to embarrass us in either case. It is plain that the author will find just as little support for his theory in the unattainable assimilation of the laws of all States.¹³ The equality of citizens and foreigners before the law, which Pfeiffer in the end appeals to, and which is, as he thinks, the only principle that can be consistently carried out along with the axiom already stated, becomes, if considered closely, in many cases a complete denial of legal rights to foreigners,¹⁴ since we cannot expect our law to be in the minds of foreigners in their own country. In any case, the author should not have passed over as he has done the subject of jurisdiction, if he wished to show more minutely that his theory is capable of being carried out in practice. In its present shape Pfeiffer's theory negatives the possibility of international intercourse.¹⁵

The French writer Gand lays down the same principle in a more moderate way, when he derives from the admitted competency of the court to decide upon a particular legal relation, the propriety of applying the law to which that court may be subject. He infers from the fact that the prevailing practice of French courts as a rule excludes, in cases where there is a question of the application of foreign laws, reduction of the judgment, in respect that no violence has been done to any definite French statute, that it rests with the court to apply or to exclude foreign law, or that it is nothing but a ¹² P. 35.¹³ P. 54.¹⁴ Savigny, § 348, Guthrie. p. 69.¹⁵ It would be well if both of these works were allowed to fall into oblivion. They are completely worthless. Pütter as well as Pfeiffer wrote without any pains on a subject which he neither understood nor had tried to learn.

The theory that sets the lex fori so much in the foreground, dates, as a matter of fact, back beyond the Middle Ages. The proposition that the litis decisoria, i.e. the determination of material questions of law, are independent of the lex fori, is old. Cf. e.g. Paul de Castr. ad Leg. 1. C. de S. Trin. No. 11. Bald Ubald in L. 1. C. ne filius pro patre, No. 10. Curt. Rochus, De Statutis, sect. 9, §§ 38-42; Mascardus concl. 9, No. 8; Burgundus, 7, No. 5, Boullenois i. pp. 533 536; Hert. iv. 70; Merlin Rép. Vo. Preuve, T. vi. p. 620.

consideration of convenience and practical advantage that opens the door for its admission. Gand, whose purpose is merely to treat of French statutes and practice in connection with the legal relations of foreigners, and who grapples with general propositions of international law, because these positive enactments are inadequate for his end, combines therewith various propositions taken from the older statute theory (§§ 180, 181, 204-220), and in doing so, greatly extends the category of real statutes. In spite of this defect, and although it is remarkable that the author does not abandon the conclusion he draws from the 14th Article of the Code Civil, which is unquestionably erroneous—viz. that a pursuer, who is a Frenchman, in a question with a foreign defender, may unconditionally elect to have French or foreign law applied to his case—the book contains many details that deserve acknowledgment. Very many judgments of French courts are reported by him, and at great length.

This view is modified in a peculiar fashion by Kori.¹⁶ He makes the substance of the judgment dependent upon the possibility of summary execution, and proposes that the form of a contract executed by a foreigner in our country, and the legal capacity of foreigners within our territory, should be determined by our law; but, as a rule, to this effect only, that the property of the foreigner which is within our country, but not any property beyond it, should be dealt with by the judgment which may be pronounced. It is easy to point out how impossible it is to carry out this theory in practice, and how plainly it conflicts with generally recognised principles of law. To carry it out, a new judgment would fall to be pronounced as often as a new article of property was brought by the foreigner into this country.¹⁷ In particular cases, however, Kori, as Wächter has shown, uses quite different premisses, although he gives no demonstration of them.¹⁸

FUNDAMENTAL WORKS.

1. V. WÄCHTER.

§ 24. We now come to those German authors who have given a new and lasting direction to the whole science of international law.

v. Wächter, in his comprehensive work begun in 1841, sets himself as his immediate task that he shall submit the statute theory to the most searching examination with special regard to the German literature only on the subject. Although his criticism is not just to the historical development of the theory, in that it forgets that Romanistic and Germanistic conceptions must often, and especially in the case of the so-called conflict of laws, lead to contradictory results, still he shows irresistibly the impossibility of holding the statute theory as it is usually conceived; at the same time, he shows that the other exclusive and abstract theories, with which the solution of the problem had, up to this time, been attempted, are equally untenable.

¹⁶ This work is short, and does not enter much into detail.

¹⁷ See Wächter, vol. i. pp. 304 et seq.

¹⁸ Brinz appears inclined (§ 23) to found modern private international law exclusively on the principle of the recognition of the legal capacity of foreigners. From this, it is said that the recognition of the vested rights of foreigners, and the rule "Locus regit actum" follow. But this latter rule is set up in opposition to the principles of international law as an anomaly, and it is hardly possible, in deciding particular questions, to be satisfied with a completely abstract principle which ignores actual systems of law (see Brinz himself, p. 124, "That is on

Only two propositions¹ seem to be left:—

First, the proposition that any judge determining a lawsuit is unconditionally bound by the law of his own territory, and,

Second, the proposition, that our enquiry must be, whether that very law, in its true meaning and spirit, does not to a certain extent decline the decision of legal questions, which have reference to foreigners or a foreign country,² and commit it to one or other foreign legal system.

The former of these two propositions is simply a consequence of the subordination of the judge to the law, but on the other side Wächter could not shut his eyes to this, that an unthinking application of native law alone would make orderly intercourse with foreign countries impossible, and would be at variance with the most patent facts and requirements. Now, since statutes do not generally make any express provision as to their application or non-application in international relations (as we may phrase it, for shortness' sake), the only thing left was to extract from the meaning and spirit of the statutes the necessary rules for their application or non-application.

In fact, both propositions are incontrovertible, and at the present day there is scarcely a thorough and reasoned judgment pronounced in any matter that touches on private international law, which does not make use of them in one direction or another.

But there may be very various ideas as to the meaning and spirit of laws in reference to international intercourse; the historical development of private international law itself shows this.³ The ancients interpreted longer a question of international law," he says of the question of the recognition of adoptions, marriages, etc., entered into by foreigners in a foreign country. Why not?)

¹Cf. i. pp. 236 et seq. and pp. 261 et seq. Wächter always adhered to the principles which he here enunciated. Cf. Wächter, Pandekten, edited by O. von Wächter, i. (1880) § 31.

²For this second proposition there may no doubt, as we have already remarked, be found several points of connection in earlier literature, and even among those who represent the statute theory. Wächter himself calls attention to this (ii. p. 16), see, for instance, Maevius, ad jus Lubec. Prolog. qu. iv. No. 26. Stryck, Diss. de juri principis extra territorium, C. iii. No. 50, No. 148, No. 166.

³The immediate foundation for the second of Wächter's propositions is, however, supplied from the point of view of the interpretation of particular territorial systems of law, by the proposition, of which Wächter takes no notice, that a process cannot be meant to create new rights, but to declare rights which are already in existence.

their laws in this aspect differently from the Middle Ages, and they again thought differently from the authorities of the present day. Thus an a priori enquiry as to the meaning and spirit of laws runs a risk of falling a victim to the caprice of the individual, unless some other fixed points can be reached. These fixed and positive points which general usage and recognition supply to us have, however, in many cases escaped Wächter. He is more alive to differences than to points of agreement, just because he goes to work too exclusively with Romanistic conceptions: it is also a matter of some importance that non-German modern literature, and particularly that of England and the United States, finds no place in Wächter's enquiries. International law is just the science in which one-sidedness cannot be avoided, unless the conflict of opinions is viewed in a mirror set up in some territorial law which differs widely from our own. In this way, then, there is no doubt that, although Wächter, in this field as in others, has made himself conspicuous by a subtle and at the same time practical juristic instinct, his decisions on particular points are not infrequently assailable in details. It is also true that a large part of the merit which he has shown in the general theoretical regions of private international law, has been lost again by the proposition which, in despair with the vagueness of any interpretation that can be put upon the phrase, "meaning and spirit of the law," he has called in aid, viz. that in doubt the judge, to whom application is made to decide the case, has to apply the law of his own territory.⁴ This is the explanation, apart from the obvious influence of a famous name, of the fact that Wächter's laborious work has so quickly and completely receded into the background behind the brilliant exposition and more philosophic conception of Savigny, and is generally in foreign countries less respected.

2. V. SAVIGNY.

§ 25. Savigny, too, does not fail to recognise that the judge must primarily be referred to the laws of his own territory. But he does not appeal to the supplementary proposition of Wächter which we have just mentioned. Instead of that, he holds it as a mere accident and immaterial which court—the court of the State A or of the State B—has to determine the dispute. His ground of decision is that States at this time of day all stand together in a great community of trade and legality. The natural result of this is not a jealous and one-sided advancement of their own territorial sovereignty, but a friendly recognition, resting upon the nature of the subject, and not therefore merely capricious, of the legal systems of other countries in reference to those legal relations which in their nature belong to these other systems. We can, then, at once retain the first proposition, by which the judge even in private international law must show obedience to the laws of his own territory, and at the same time say, also in accordance with Savigny's conception, that private international law in a practical view is simply a question as to the interpretation of the laws of different States. But this interpretation must proceed as may be demanded by the existence of that general mutual recognition of each other by the legal systems of different countries, within the limits of their jurisdiction, which limits again are fixed by the nature of the subject—i.e. the general intercourse of nations. If, then, it must be admitted that there is an opposition between the conceptions of Wächter and Savigny, it is however not so important as, for instance, Reinh. Schmid has assumed. For, if Wächter's particular discussions are followed out, it will be observed that he too, like Savigny, starts from a recognition of the operation of the foreign law in the region to which it belongs; only Wächter is not so fully conscious of what he is doing, and his work is not so comprehensive; besides, he is often disturbed by the influence of that erroneous proposition, which prescribes the application of the native law of the judge in cases of doubt. He is often, too, disturbed by the mistaken belief that all those conclusions which Savigny, in accordance with his fundamental idea, could draw most freely from the nature of the subject, and could set up as law already recognised, are to begin with mere conclusions de lege ferenda, which belong to the region of mere expediency, and may be taken up according to his good pleasure by the lawgiver of any territory, but, also just as much at his good pleasure, may be rejected by him.¹

⁴ Against this last proposition, see Savigny himself (p. 126, § 361, Guthrie, p. 143), "the proposition is said to apply in every case, except when the authority of another local law can be completely established. Thus the conclusiveness of the principle appears to be assumed in advance for the numerous cases in which plausible reasons, weighty authorities, or decisions of courts, can be adduced for one side or the other. Here, therefore, the method of the civil procedure, in which every one on whom the burden of proof lies loses his cause, if he does not succeed in his proof, is to some extent adopted." Wächter besides, in following his principle, has fallen into a difficult position in cases where he has not to deal with the laws of different States, but with the divergent laws of provinces of the same State. For this he has promised a solution, but has not given one. (Cf. ii. pp. 3 and 20, note 208. Pondekten, § 31 ad fin.)

On the other hand, in my first edition I have declared myself against the much admired formula, which is so often quoted, in which Savigny attempted to explain his principle in more picturesque fashion. You must, says Savigny, seek that domain of law to which the particular legal relation in its nature belongs, in which it has its seat. I have already said, in my first edition [p. 59 of translation], that this proposition, admitting as it does of the most various meanings, required for its application to particular chapters of law a further development, which is often to be desiderated in Savigny. What, for instance, would hinder us from assigning the legal relation to the State whose judge had to decide upon it, or generally to the territory on which it makes its appearance, and so, under certain circumstances, to a great number of different territories? Savigny, accordingly, can do no more than postulate (p. 134, § 365, Guthrie, p. 166) the application of the laws of the domicile to determine the legal capacity and status of the person. He says again, for instance, in reference to the determination of questions of immoveable property by the lex rei sitæ: "Whoever wishes to acquire, hold, or exercise a right over a thing, betakes himself for this end to its site, and subjects himself voluntarily, for this single legal relation, to the local law that prevails in that territory." Now, upon this it is to be remarked, that in this sense all laws touching property rest upon voluntary subjection. Renounce the property in question, and you are no longer subject to the law. But it is nowhere demonstrated why these laws, which are valid in the place where the property is, should demand this voluntary, or more correctly, this necessary subjection in relation to questions connected with them. We shall show, again, that Savigny's proposition is not merely an indistinct figure,² but contains a really erroneous conception. A legal relation, as a general rule, with regard to which we can raise the question whether this or that territorial law should be applied, never belongs exclusively either to the one or the other domain. It may, if we wish to use an image, have its roots or its stem in one, while its branches stretch out into the other.

¹ See Wächter, i. p. 240. No one, however, could assert with certainty that it is never on any account permissible to interpret an existing law by grounds of expediency: all that may be said is that the limits to be observed in such cases cannot be fixed a priori. On the other hand, every State, as we have already said, has the power of withdrawing itself from the general rule, for the most part to the loss of its own people; the rule, therefore, as Puchta notices, must have exceptions. The safe juristic sense of Thöl (§ 113) recognised this, and saw that in private international law no sufficient foundation for general principles could be laid without an exact enquiry into details (pp. 175, 176); this enquiry could not take place in the introduction to German private law [which was his subject], and therefore Thöl went too far in rejecting general principles, and fell short of the proper points of view, which, however, as details are further mastered, are exhibited with certainty. The subtle, but, I am sorry to say, too short remarks of my honoured teacher, and subsequently my colleague, I shall notice as I come to the particular questions with which he deals.

In spite of this error, in spite of his not infrequent failure to work out details with care, without which no certainty is to be reached in the domain of private international law; in spite, too, of this, that he is not quite just to the opposition of Roman and Germanic legal principles and conceptions in private international law,³ Savigny's merit stands undiminished. That merit is to have been the first to take up with full consciousness his starting-point in the idea of an international community of law which restricts all territorial laws, and defines their competency, and in thinking, not of a conflict of legal systems, but of a harmonious combination of all.⁴

² See, on the other hand, Walter, D. Privatr. § 43; Brinz, Pand. i. p. 102, note 8; Dernburg, Pand. i. § 45, note 6; Torres Campos, p. 306. Thöl also, p. 168, although upon the whole he follows Savigny's views, seems not to have been pleased with the indistinct figure. He conceives the question (agreeing rather with Wächter) as one of the interpretation of statutes or laws. Every statutory provision as to this conflict of laws is a provision as to the interpretation of laws. Accordingly, in every doubtful case, one must enquire under the supremacy of which law it falls, i.e. which law regulates it. But Thöl's conception implies in one relation certainly, as we have said, a step back from Savigny's position.

⁴ Cf. especially p. 29, § 348, Guthrie, p. 72. Laurent, i. § 408, gives a peculiar criticism of Savigny's principle. We shall return to it later, in estimating the modern Italian school.

GERMAN LITERATURE FOLLOWING ON SAVIGNY: MODIFICATIONS OF SAVIGNY'S PRINCIPLE; ATTACKS ON IT; RESPECT PAID TO IT IN OTHER COUNTRIES, ESPECIALLY IN ENGLAND AND THE UNITED STATES.

§ 26. In order, however, to be able to treat the principles of Wächter and Savigny as in reality at one, it is certainly necessary to put altogether aside that subsidiary principle of Wächter, which confuses his whole theory, according to which the lex fori is in case of doubt to be applied. I mean that it must be put aside not merely if one proceeds from the notion of a certain common bond among the different territorial systems of law—which possibly was in his time not yet recognised—but even if one starts from the point of any one of the territorial systems.¹ I attempted that in my first edition, by pointing to the principle, which is recognised among all civilised peoples, according to which the suit is meant, not to create new rights, but to clear rights which are already in existence. If the law of the court that is to give judgment were, in every case, or even in cases of doubt only,² to pronounce upon the material import of the legal relations that may be in dispute, there can be no doubt, since very different tribunals may come to be competent in a particular case, that in many instances the judge would either have to create, or at least to modify, the legal relation in question. But the issue cannot, in accordance with that generally accepted principle, depend on the place where any legal relation may accidentally come to be the subject of a legal process, even if we leave out of view the very serious practical results of a theory which makes the import of a legal relation depend on the lex fori—i.e. in the case where the courts of different States are equally competent, on the pleasure of the pursuer, and, at the same time, attributes an extra-territorial and even a retro-active force to native statutes, by demanding, as Heffter³ remarks, that foreigners, in a foreign country, in bargaining about subjects situated there, should follow the law of the place.

If, then, the application of foreign law seems, under certain circumstances, when express instructions are wanting, to be demanded, and the view of the legislator must be discovered indirectly by a process of reasoning, we cannot recognise as sound the objection that the view of the legislator cannot be objectively ascertained, but must rather be arrived at by subjective and arbitrary conjectures. In reality, I further remarked, such a distinction between objective and subjective demonstration does not exist.

But if the principles that are postulated for the various branches of ¹ This inference has recently been followed by Martens, ii. p. 289.

² In my first edition, it is true that I did not add "or even in cases of doubt only." At that time my argument was mainly directed against Pfeiffer and others; but it holds equally against Wächter's subsidiary principle. I had not at that time seen the criticisms of Reinhold Schmid, which will be discussed immediately: as has been said, he discerns a difference between Wächter and Savigny that goes very deep.

our subject are in harmony with each other, and if these principles can be logically pursued into details without contradicting the rules that are generally recognised in practice by all nations, and without doing violence to the natural instincts of justice and equity; and if, besides, it can be shown that the most eminent authors and the decisions of supreme courts agree in their results with the view adopted by the legislator, although not invariably in the grounds on which these results are based, and which are so often inexactly or incompletely expressed, then the author believes that he will have pointed out an objective truth; and, even although our jurisprudence shall concern itself with one particular territorial system only, we can arrive at no greater certainty, at least not in any of those cases in which there is the slightest possibility of a doubt.

Reinhold Schmid, who treats of private international law in one part of a monograph which is not very comprehensive, has taken objection to this way of dealing with the subject. One of his objections we have already considered in paragraph 4. He derives his second from the difference between Wächter and Savigny, according to his erroneous conception of that difference. A third and last objection is directed against Savigny's view and mine alike. We have not hitherto mentioned that Savigny indicated the existence of a particular class of laws, which, in his view, do not find their origin or object in the pure domain of law, but rather rest on moral grounds, or grounds of public advantage, publica utilitas. He calls these coercitive (Zwingende) laws, and is of opinion that, in so far as such laws are concerned, every State stands out completely separate and distinct; that here, therefore, the legal community of States, recognised though it be in other matters, ceases, or, as one might equally well say, is proclaimed to be excluded from the particular State in question. The judge, then, or the territory in question—and Savigny has not thought out this alternative quite clearly—excludes the application of all foreign rules of law that differ from his or its own.⁴

Reinhold Schmid has used this idea—which in itself is certainly not quite clear, and to which we shall return again below, because the modern Italian school has attached itself to it—as the basis for a far-reaching attack on Savigny's detailed enquiries, and also, if I may say so, on my own. The attack, however, is also made against much that has been adopted by general consent at least all over the Continent of Europe. From this exclusion of foreign law by positive, coercitive statutes, he draws the conclusion that the application of foreign rules of law must as a general rule be rejected if it would disturb or unsettle the native legal order. Schmid does not, of course, fail to recognise that the application of foreign rules of law in every country necessarily introduces a certain disturbance into the uniformity of legal decisions, but that this disadvantage is generally more than counterbalanced by the advantage of an orderly international intercourse. In all cases, however, in which this does not happen, in which the disadvantage outweighs the advantage, the preference, says

Schmid, must be given to the native law over the foreign law, be the former a coercitive law or be it not. Now, although we cannot in private international law dismiss this last deliverance quite offhand, still in most cases it will lead to a certain amount of arbitrary or capricious conclusions. This caprice discloses itself pretty frequently in Schmid's observations on particular cases, which in many other respects deserve to be highly valued. Nothing but a careful study and use of literature, and of the practice that has disposed of particular cases, can protect one from this caprice in private international law, since theories of international law cannot fairly be charged with the duty of creating law anew. Discussions which are purely general, and which avoid any such laborious enquiry into details, have clearly no value to speak of.⁵ On the one hand, many points, as we have already noticed, are better established in practice than a superficial consideration might lead us to suppose; and, on the other, the author who gives himself up entirely to general observations, fails to notice to what conclusions these will lead him in particular cases. Schmid's work, which does not extend to the law of process, closes the series of German monographs which treat of private international law as a whole. We have only further to mention the wonderfully careful and valuable exposition of international law, as recognised in Germany, which is to be found in Stobbe's Deutsches Privatrecht (i. pp. 198-254, 309-326),⁶ and also the short sketch of international law in general, also very careful and very rich in positive information, which A. V. Bulmerincq gave in Marquardsen's handbook of public law, ii. 2, pp. 208-241. I too, in 1882, published a short sketch of private international law for the fourth edition of Holtzendorff's Encyclopædia of Jurisprudence (pp. 674-718). Bulmerincq's sketch pays more attention to positive details, while in my sketch I have rather turned my attention to the exposition and criticism of the rules depending on the principles of the science, a method in accordance with the plan of the Encyclopædia. German literature has little to say on particular questions of private international law. The French law of respite or delay in payment (moratorium), passed during the French and German war, then the case of De Bauffremont, and the dispute which arose with the managers of the Austrian railways in consequence of the demonetization of silver, much excited German literature from time to time. In the department of the law of process, apart from a work of Francke's on the operation of foreign judgments in the German Empire, which belongs more to the positive law of German process, the paper by Lammasch (Innsbrück), entitled, "Staatsverträge, betreffend Rechtshilfe und Auslieferung," in Holtzendorff's "Handbuch des Völkerrechts," vol. iii., must be mentioned as a valuable work. The doctrine of allegiance has been specially cultivated in Germany by v. Martitz.⁷ Savigny's theory, however, may unhesitatingly be described as the prevailing theory; it is followed, although not perhaps in all its particulars, by the most eminent authors⁸ upon Roman and German private law.⁹ And in the decisions of courts there are many references made to this theory. It is no other than Savigny's theory which Bucher puts forward in his "nouveau traité de droit international privé au double point de vue de la théorie et de la pratique" (1876),¹⁰ since his conception of private international law is the determination of the competency of the legislatures of the individual States, the foundations for that competency being to be found in the nature of the subject matter, in the interests which constitute the basis of all law,¹¹ in the nature of sovereignty, which is at once a personal and in another direction a territorial bond.¹²

⁵ As against Schmid, see Stobbe's apposite remark, § 29, note 12.

Johann Vesque v. Püttlingen's Handbook of Private International Law, as it is recognised in Austria-Hungary, is at least under the influence of Savigny's theory, and is remarkable besides for an accurate investigation of details. The author, however, is of the opinion that the provisions of Austrian law, although they may not all approach closer to the modern scientific standpoint, yet contain special regulations, or regulations based upon sound principle, for most cases of private international law; as a rule, this makes it unnecessary to go back upon what is represented to be the deliverances of "the law of nature."

⁹ v. Martens, ii. p. 286, may also be called an adherent of this theory.

¹⁰ The introduction is printed in the Revue, viii. pp. 35 et seq. (An earlier paper of Brocher is in the Revue in 1871.)

and respects Savigny's principle as such, and its influence is unmistakably to be met with in the works of Westlake, Beach-Lawrence,¹ and Wharton. All these most meritorious works, of which Westlake's and Phillimore's belong to England, Beach-Lawrence's and Wharton's to the United States, pay more regard to the modern literature of the European continent than the older works of the English and American jurisprudence did. This is more especially the case with the most comprehensive and richest of these works, that of the learned American, Wharton, who at the same time always takes the trouble to enter into the views of the jurisprudence of other countries where it differs from that of his own country, and to be just to it. As a matter of fact, there is no doubt that the jurisprudence of the United States rests upon its old traditions to a greater degree than that of the most modern English school. The active intercourse with the continent of Europe makes itself felt even in the jurisprudence of England.

The works of the Belgian jurist Asser, and of the Russian lecturer on public law, Fr. v. Martens, rest also upon Savigny's principle, although they do not take it expressly for their foundation.

Asser's work,² although it has not a very wide scope, is distinguished by a fine practical instinct, and devotes particular attention to commercial law. In the French edition, its value is materially enhanced by the frequent critical notes of Rivier, which take into account the more modern literature. The chapters of v. Marten's work on public law, given up to private international law, count among the shorter works on the subject; but the author, so far as he could within his narrow limits, has considered and criticised the most modern literature without prejudice or partiality, and the necessities of legal intercourse find themselves appreciated most practically by this author.

Despagnet, the most recent of French writers, attaches himself to Savigny's theory.

THE NEW ITALIAN SCHOOL AND ITS ADHERENTS IN BELGIUM AND FRANCE.

MANCINI, ESPERSON, FIORE; LAURENT, DURAND, WEISS.

§ 28. On the other hand, the new Italian school¹ stands in real opposition to the German doctrine based on Savigny, although happily the practical results to which it attains do not differ so considerably from those of the German school, as might be expected from the way in which it formulates its principles. In spite of this opposition, there are points of connection between them, and Laurent goes so far as to say that it was due to nothing but the influence of the political circumstances of Germany, which showed themselves to be unfavourable at the time to the development of Savigny's leading idea, that Savigny himself did not reach the principles of the modern Italian school.

² German translation of Asser's original work, by G. Cohn (Conrad), Berlin 1880.

¹ Brusa, however, in his excellent notes to the third edition of Casanova, Lezioni del diritto internazionale, ii. pp. 325 et seq.—Casanova having merely repeated the maxims enunciated by Rocco—defends Savigny's point of view against the Italian school with great breadth and impartiality. In the same way, the Spanish jurist Torres Campos, in his remarkable treatise, "Principios de derecho internacional privado," has attached himself rather to the German school (cf., especially, p. 306).

Like Savigny, the modern Italian school² starts from the principle of the legal community of nations. Savigny, however, deduces from that no more than a certain limitation of territorial sovereignty, which in the abstract is unlimited,³ a limitation the character of which must be determined by the "nature of the subject," so as to fit this or that particular legal relation which may be in question. The Italian jurisprudence proposes to substitute for this limitation of territorial sovereignty an abstract rule which shall be universally applicable, and it finds this rule by dividing all systems of law into two parts. The one is merely an expression of personality, or, since personality is in its turn determined by nationality, an expression of nationality;⁴ the other takes its rise from public order, the necessary respect that must be had for the whole as distinguished from the individual, for public welfare and for public order. If, then, personality in its national character is to be recognised in foreign countries, the next inference is that the national law of this personality must be also recognised; the one cannot be separated from the other.⁵ But the territorial laws of public order of the community must not suffer. These must always, in case of conflict, be preferred to the individual. Thus, in the view of the Italian school, the same principle which determines, or should determine, the native law of every State, holds good also in international law. The freedom of the individual is the principle, but this must always give way when public order, the welfare of the whole, peremptorily demands that it should do so. But the instance which they prefer to use, in order to make it clear that the laws, which are to follow the individual into a foreign country, are in truth merely an expression of the natural (or national) personality, which depends on the race of the

² Brocher, in the Revue for 1880, pp. 531 et seq., gives a temperate but not altogether approving review of the new Italian school (cf. Brocher again, Nouv. traité, pp. 52 et seq.). L. Strisower, in Nos. 20-26, of the Wiener Gerichtshalle, 1881, has a sharper but most opposite review of the school, which has appeared separately under the title, "Die Italienische Schule des Internationalen Privatrechts."

individual, is that of personal capacity⁶ for legal acts, and in particular that of minority and majority. There is no doubt that the lawgiver desires to place immature persons under tutory, and to allow mature persons to act independently. But maturity is a natural condition of the individual, determined by the race and the climate to which he belongs, and in which he has grown up. The national law in this case merely follows nature, and is an expression of that which lies in the nature of the person. In this way the legislator of a foreign territory, if he recognises the personality of our countrymen as such at all, cannot help recognising it as minor or major, according as the domestic law of the individual may lay down. Personal law is itself the personality; it is, as Laurent says, like the blood which fills the veins, the marrow and the bones.⁷ And since all private rights are recognised for the sake of the persons to whom they belong, so private international law as a whole recognises no other law than the domestic law of the persons⁸ concerned, limited only by the territorial laws of public order.⁹ But, again, the will of the individual in itself is not tied to any territorial limits; individuals may expressly or by implication subject themselves to a foreign law, and this subjection in its turn must be recognised everywhere, in so far as the territorial law of public order is not thereby infringed.

These general rules, which were for the first time set up in a famous introductory lecture by Mancini¹⁰ in 1851, and were repeated and further developed, especially by Esperson, apart from the brilliant and talented rhetoric and dialectic in which they were set out, necessarily awakened all the louder echo in Italy, as the young kingdom had just established her unity, and taken her place in the family of European States under the motto, "Nationality and Freedom." These principles have become in Italy almost an article of faith in jurisprudence;¹¹ and, as Italian juristic science began to treat international law, and private international law particularly, with special zeal, and in its details did much, as must be confessed, that merits the highest recognition, working always in a liberal spirit for the service of trade and intercourse in general, the principles of the Italian school have gained many adherents in France.¹² It makes it all the more impossible to pass them over in silence in Germany, that that most comprehensive work, which concludes private international law, the work of Laurent, that Belgian law professor who is so much respected in the whole French and Romanistic world, takes them up with enthusiasm.

¹¹ Cf. e.g. B. Gianzana, i. No. 29 et seq. This enthusiasm leads, as may be understood, to unjust conclusions as to other systems. Thus Gianzana (i. No. 26) is of opinion that the English system of territoriality is a negation of human personality, and robs men of the capacity of travelling over the world and subjecting themselves to other laws. English jurists are of opinion that the English principle of domicile, as distinguished from that of nationality, is the very thing to create the possibility of unlimited travelling, and unlimited subjection of oneself to the laws of other countries.

¹² So, for instance, Durand (cf. especially § 120, p. 238), Weiss, p. 232. Weiss, in place of the word "nationality of law," uses the title, "personality of law."

The theory, too, seems to recommend itself to notice from a historical point of view, for we believe that a connection is to be established between it and the statute theory.¹³ We saw that in France and Germany the supremacy of the lex domicilii, or, as it was afterwards called, the statutum personale, which had been heralded by the later commentators with a certain amount of predilection, had in the course of centuries gained more and more ground as against the lex rei sitæ or statutum personale, in consequence of the increasing force of the conceptions of the Roman law. The Italian school and Laurent felt themselves justified in proclaiming the goal of historical development to be that theory which, as a matter of principle, looked upon all private law and rights as an appendage of the personality of the individual, and as subject to the personal statute which was everywhere supreme. And although they could not deny the exclusive authority of the lex rei sitæ in certain cases—e.g. in true questions as to immoveable subjects, this exception seemed to them to be merely a special application of the restraining force of the laws, whose object it is to protect public order.¹⁴ The new Italian doctrine might therefore be counted as a logical development of the doctrine of the later commentators, and this seemed to have all the stronger foundation, if the new doctrine of the operation of the wishes of the parties, which must be recognised everywhere, were set up as a parallel to the old category of the statutum mixtum. The new Italian school has, besides these, still closer points of connection.

It does not much concern this branch of the subject that Mailher de Chassat set up, so long ago as 1845, a doctrine which resembled this theory in many aspects, but which, so confused was it, did not obtain much respect.¹⁵

¹³ Cf. e.g. Mancini, Revue, vii. p. 354; Laurent, i. §§ 200 and 344. It is certainly true that in the statute theory, as time went on, a wider field was assigned to the so-called personal statute. The cause lies simply in the advance of the idea of the Roman universal succession in the law of inheritance, in the operation of this idea upon the law of the property of spouses, and in the decline and disappearance of feudal law, and the institutions which were analogous and akin to it.

¹⁴ Laurent consistently calls these "statuts réels."

¹⁵ He wishes to have a foreigner recognised in the new international intercourse—which in his view rests on the principles of intelligence, humanity, and nationality—as the representative of the nation to which he belongs; private international law is to him simply the law of one nationality within the domains of another, and is to be distinguished in his view from the conflicts of the old statutes, which were, as he thinks, merely the products of egotism and the feudal system (§§ 53, 337). The conflict, according to him, resolves itself into a conflict of the different sovereign powers. Mailher thinks that in this proposition he has discovered the solution of the question, while at the same time he invokes the assistance of a second proposition, viz. the independence of nations. It is not clear how these two propositions, the free development of foreign nationality in other countries and its limitation by the laws of these countries—to use Mailher's own expressions (pp. 323, 324)—are to be reconciled with each other.

(CRITICISM OF THE MODERN ITALIAN SCHOOL: (STRISOWER); DEFENCE AND MODIFICATION OF ITS DOCTRINES BY FUSINATO.

§ 29. It is, however, worth remarking that Savigny (pp. 35, 36, § 349, Guthrie, p. 78) as a matter of fact distinguishes two classes of laws to this effect, that he regards the one class as enacted for the sake of persons who are the possessors of rights—the purely legal enactments in his view—while he assigns to the other class an end and object beyond the province of pure law, an object that belongs to morality or publica utilitas. This division has an unmistakable resemblance to that upon which the principles of the modern Italian school rest. That Savigny only used it by the way, in order to found upon it the exception to the rule of international community in law, to justify the special treatment of the so-called prohibitive laws, is not so much to be accounted for, as Laurent (i. § 419) thinks, by supposing that Savigny was deficient in philosophic sense, or was still trammelled by the bonds of feudalism, as by the fact that this idea did not seem to him to be clear enough to found an entire system upon.¹ As a fact, all rules of law have an end and object which lies outside of the pure domain of law, although that object may not have been consciously present to the framers of the law, and although it may frequently be a mistake to assign certain perfectly definite objects to this or that rule of law. Rules of law always serve, or ought to serve, the welfare of individuals, i.e. the welfare of the preponderating majority of individuals, and thus the welfare of the whole commonwealth. In this sense, the motto on v. Ihering's work, "The end and object of law" (Der Zweck im Rechte) says truly, "The end of law is in truth that which creates it." No one, after the proof adduced by Ihering in his "Geist des Römischen Rechts," can ever again believe that rules of law were brought into existence for the mere pleasure of drawing logical conclusions, and still less that they were so brought into existence for the mere pleasure of completing the steps of a precise dialectic. In truth, Savigny believed nothing of the kind, as is shown by the many expositions which his system of Roman law contains, all pointing at the real objects of rules of law. The distinction mentioned above was only used by Savigny as a means of giving the class of prohibitive laws, in the presence of which international community of law is said to come to an end, a wider scope than truly belongs to it. Savigny, however, required this wider scope, to enable him to preserve many of his propositions which otherwise would have been too universally stated, and he required it specially on the ground that he was still too much occupied with Romanistic conceptions to be able to do justice to the principles of German law, which require quite a different treatment in private international law. It is true that, owing to the far-reaching differences in the moral conceptions of different nations and States, there must be gaps in the international community of law. Our legal system can never hold out its hand to help in realising within its territory a legal relation, which from our point of view must be regarded as immoral. But this class of laws must not be further extended. Savigny, however, proposes to reckon among their number, first, all laws in which we can find a politico-economical object; and, secondly, all cases in which our laws do not recognise at all some legal institution of another State. But almost every rule of law belongs to the former of these classes, and thus we should make an end of that community of law on which Savigny has so strongly insisted. An example will make that quite plain. Savigny himself has most energetically maintained that, because the law of inheritance is that of an universal succession to the whole estate, it must be regulated exclusively by the law of the domicile of the deceased, and cannot be subject at once to all the different laws that prevail in the territories through which the different items of the estate are scattered. But politico-economical objects may very well be protected by a diametrically opposite rule of succession.² A different economical effect, for instance, is produced according as you prefer one child of the deceased, say the eldest son, to the inheritance, or allow it to go in equal shares among all his children. Quite different economical results are produced by the Roman order of succession in more distant degrees, according to which the nearness of degree confers a preference, and by a simple ranking of children as in their parents' right, an arrangement which, it is said, may reduce the whole estate to atoms. Indeed, different economical results must be produced according as the term of majority is earlier or later, and the possibility of independent trading thus advanced or retarded; and the same may be said of differences in the conditions of emancipation from a father's authority. In this way we should have to deal with prohibitive laws in questions of inheritance, capacity, and so on, and the application of personal laws would thus be excluded from these subjects; and what would there be left for the legal community of States, or for the extra-territorial operation of personal statutes, to work upon? But as far as the second case, the case of what may be called implicit prohibitive laws, is concerned, it may be that it is intended to take the title of the legal institution in question as the determining point. But to do so would obviously be wrong; for the same title, e.g. property in a human being, might be used in two different States to denote legal institutions of such a thoroughly different legal character, that we could not consent to allow the operation of the foreign conditions of things to take place on our territory, as being contradictory to our views of morality. On the other hand, the same legal institution might have different titles in different States. In truth, then, we must always have appeal to the rules of law themselves; it matters not whether we can or will speak of an identity in the legal institutions in question or not.

In fact, the whole doctrine of prohibitive or coercitive laws, as Savigny

has set it up, is a mere device by which he seeks to deliver himself from the uncomfortable and untenable consequences of what we must call—without doing any violence to the genius of his general conceptions—the very unsatisfactory and untenable deductions which we find in the details of his work.³

The attempt, therefore, of the Italian school to found private international law upon a division of the different rules of law, which does not advance us a step beyond Savigny's division into prohibitive and non-prohibitive laws, must prove a failure in spite of the difficulty of finding the logical flaws, which permeate the foundations of this doctrine, through the dazzling rhetorical polish that covers them.

Fusinato has recently given the best defence of the more modern Italian school, and it can certainly be said that his judgment is more unbiassed than that of any of his countrymen, except Brusa. He is not blind to several of its weak points. In the first place—as Fusinato, too, recognises (Il principio della scuola Italiana nel dir. priv. internaz.)—nationality, as a fact in nature, and allegiance to a particular State are, not always nowadays identical conceptions. As the law of the person is to be held to be merely the legal expression of natural facts, e.g. of his maturity or his capacity to act, as the case may be, so the same assertion may be made of nationality in the strictest sense, i.e. which rests upon descent, but it cannot be made of Nationalita in its juristic sense. For, on the one hand, any man may by naturalisation, which is an artificial means, come to belong to a State with which he has no connection by descent; and, on the other hand, the boundaries of States are in many cases not coincident with those of nationality, so that people belonging to various nationalities are united under the same State-authority and legislation. The Italian jurisprudence, however, applies all that it thinks it has proved of nationalities in the natural sense, nationalities resting on the basis of descent, to that nationality in the juristic sense, which is so widely different a thing, i.e. the fact of belonging to a particular State.⁴ If it had proposed to take nationality in its natural sense, it would simply be proceeding upon a theory which would be contradictory of existing public law, and purely revolutionary. It does not desire to be guilty of this mistake; but, in avoiding it, it falls into the logical error of confusing its definitions.

Strisower, then, was the first to meet Mancini on this point, Esperson and Laurent carried the opposition further, and Fusinato expounded it still further, in an impartial and valuable fashion. Their point is that in our ³ See, for instance, what Savigny has said on the law of pledge, p. 167, § 368, Guthrie, p. 192. See, on the other hand, Lehr. Journal, ix. p. 262, who very properly expounds the view that, if the institution of adoption does not exist in one country, an adoption which has taken place in another country is not on that account to be declared to be without any legal effect, as being opposed to public order.

⁴ Fiore, Diritto pubblico internazionale, ii. § 878. Esperson (according to the quotation given by Fusinato) and Fusinato (p. 28) have protested vigorously against the possibility of time even those laws which most immediately concern the person, e.g. determine his personality, are not in any way dependent on the natural conditions of his development, especially of climate, but are rather the product of considerations of expediency of the most various kinds, or frequently of accidental majorities in the legislative assemblies. Thus Fusinato (p. 50) comes to the correct conclusion, that in the present time even the so-called personal statutes in many cases do not answer to the views of the individual who is under their dominion, as no doubt they did in the old times, when law was allowed to grow and develop quite naturally; and that it may even be the case that in that relation the law of a foreign State may answer the views and the individuality of the citizen far better than his own. Thus he resolutely casts away from him the broken crutch which is pieced together out of the alleged natural identity of the person and the law that controls the person (the law of personal status), and deduces the necessity for the general recognition of the so-called personal status, in accordance with the law of the home of the person, from the necessities of a legal trade and commerce, which require that the status of the person must be uniform, and that it shall not transform itself every time that the person crosses the frontier of another State. But, in doing this, Fusinato has unwittingly abandoned the principles of the Italian school: he deduces his principle for the so-called personal statutes from the necessities of commerce, that is, from the nature of the subject.

Fusinato, then (pp. 60 et seq.), expressly declares himself against the high-sounding principle of liberty (Laurent, ii. § 422), by which the law of contracts is said to be ruled. In the sketch of private international law which I prepared for Holtzendorff's Encyclopædia, I declared myself in agreement with the principles which I laid down in the former edition of this book (§§ 66 and 69), and in agreement also with Strisower's excellent expositions, as against the conception adopted by the Italian school and also by Laurent, which pays no real heed in the law of obligations except to the individual will of the parties, which is to be sought out by the judge, or inferred from the circumstances of the particular case. In most cases in the law of obligations, which come up for discussion, the limits assigned by the law to the will of the parties are not in dispute, because there is no doubt that parties have kept themselves within them. But yet, as a matter of scientific principle, the first question is not, What did the parties de facto intend? but, What was it within their power to intend in accordance with the law?—i.e. to intend in the sense that the law will attach to their intention the legal consequences of a lawful operation of the will, that is, the legal consequences of a compulsitor in one way or another (although not taking the nationalita of the Italian school in that natural meaning. Laurent, ii. p. 109, has certainly strayed in the same direction, when he brings the principle, which has heretofore prevailed in Prussia, that personal status should not depend on allegiance but on domicile, into connection with the condition of the Poles in Prussia. As if the same principle did not also prevail over the greater part of Germany—except, for instance, in the kingdom of Saxony—and had prevailed there before the partition of Poland.

always precisely by way of granting decree in an action). The Italian school, and with it Laurent, help themselves over this difficulty by that appeal to the territoriality of the laws of public order, which lies always ready to their hand: we shall come to the discussion of those laws immediately. But this simple juristic error is left standing, viz. that they confuse the so-called dispositive laws, with which we are most largely concerned in the law of obligations, with the intention of the individual parties to any case. "We can only say that, if the parties thought reasonably upon the matter, they would recognise as a general rule as right what the law so recognises, in default of a contrary declaration of intention. We may say, more shortly and more clearly: the so-called dispositive law is that which according to the opinion of the legislator, follows from the nature of the subject, and the result is that, on the one hand, very many consequences attach themselves to a legal transaction, of which the parties never dreamed—what would be the result, if a legal transaction had no other consequences than what the parties meant and wished? ⁵—and, on the other hand, that the regulation of the dispositive law for the individual case may possibly be highly unreasonable (inappropriate)." But if, on the other hand, it were the duty of the law to enquire what in each individual case suited the parties, such a process would mean the end of jurisprudence, and the beginning of simple caprice. It is, then, no trifling matter to confuse the intention of parties in the particular case, although it may not be expressed in words, but may be tacitly understood, with dispositive law.

LAWS OF PUBLIC ORDER, FOR WHICH THE PRINCIPLE OF TERRITORIALITY IS SAID TO GIVE THE RULE: BROCHER'S DEFINITION OF THE LAWS OF Ordre Public International.

§ 30. But the new school finds its greatest difficulty in exactly specifying those laws which embody the territorial sovereign power, and limit the law which in other respects is recognised as the accessorium of the individual. Fusinato remarks most truly that this specification is all the more important for the Italian school, as it is in this matter dealing with one of its main principles, and not, as in other systems of private international law, e.g. that of Savigny, with an exception to these principles. Fusinato, in the first place, recognises that Savigny's definition is faulty and unpractical (see above, p. 65). But he describes, with as much truth as frankness (p. 74), the expression, "laws which concern public order, ordre public," as highly inappropriate and ambiguous.¹ Rules of law which belong to jus publicum include all such laws as do not give way to the will of the parties (jus publicum quod privatorum pactis mutari non potest), include, for instance, all laws that are concerned with status. By a definition like this, we should arrive at the exclusion of all laws that touched on status, and of the majority of those that are concerned with the law of the family. Fusinato, again, is of opinion, and justly, that the definition of the class as consisting of all laws which touch or concern morality or good manners, is quite as uncertain. All laws which deal with the relations of parents and children, with impediments to marriage, with contracts between spouses, and so on, belong to this class, and thus we come again to an exclusion of foreign rules of law so complete as pretty well to extinguish the vaunted principle of the ubiquity of the recognition of personal laws.² Laurent finally speaks of social law in contrast with private law. But this expression is no better than the other, although Laurent most solemnly guards himself against identifying the "Droit social" with the mere interests of society. With such a vague expression as the "interests of society" to use, you might assert as complete a supremacy for the law of the territory as you pleased, for it is always uncomfortable, and in some measure prejudicial, if judges and residents in any State have now and again to inform themselves as to foreign law. But, as Fusinato very truly says (p. 84), if one once gets beyond the region of purely positive law, no distinction can any longer be made between the interests and the laws of society. He gives a complete bouquet of logical self-deceptions,³ by which Laurent, as it suits him, now assumes and now negatives a law of society. Thus Fusinato comes to almost the same conclusion as I reached in Holtzendorff's "Encyclopædia," that this whole principle is as yielding as wax and as elastic as india-rubber, and that you can by it prove everything and nothing.⁴

Besides Fusinato, there is no lack of important authorities who have

² Fiore, § 168, in fact sets up the proposition that all laws which are intended to preserve morality and discipline in the family are applicable to strangers as well as to natives. But in that case, what is left for the so-called personal statute? (See, on the other hand, Fusinato, p. 76.)

³ One of the most remarkable examples is his frequent assumption (cf. Laurent, iii. pp. 208-511) that if the domestic legislature has carried out a change in a matter of principle in any branch of the law, it has thereby recognised that there is no question of social law or ordre public in the matter. Thus if, as was the case in France in 1816, the State abolishes divorce (of course as an immoral institution) in a country where it had formerly existed, it thereby recognises that it is not dealing with public order—a thing that must be maintained inviolate. But the case, as a general rule, is exactly the reverse: we make up our minds to a thorough change in the law because we consider the former state of things socially dangerous, and contrary to the laws of society.

declared themselves at variance with the principle of ordre public as one of the main principles of the science.⁵ In the note⁶ the reader will find a small additional selection of specimens of the Proteus-like nature of this principle of "ordre public," which is so accommodating and convenient, that is, in cases where, but for it, the juristic inference would certainly be open to doubt. In truth it cannot be otherwise; for each and every law has some relation to the common weal: it is never the case that they exclusively consult the welfare of the individual.

Fusinato (p. 86) finally decides to adopt this formula: he speaks of laws which obviously and mainly (evidentemente e principalmente) have as their object morality or political, social, or politico-economical interests. But it is not clear that this formula advances us a step. The laws, for instance, which deal with the equal or unequal division of an inheritance among the children of a deceased parent, or give him a more or less extensive power of dividing the estate which he leaves, have, as their obvious object, politico-economical interests as well. Indeed, it is quite possible that these interests stand in the very first rank, since it is quite conceivable that statutory regulations of this kind were passed for the very object, it may be, of protecting the authority of the father, or of preventing too minute a subdivision of property as a general rule, and not merely to guard against the partition of particular estates. Again, no one, for instance, will doubt that the forms of acquiring property in land are exclusively determined by the lex rei sitæ, and even in cases which concern moveables this is now the prevailing opinion. Is there any better ground for speaking of moral or politico-economical interests in these cases than in those which deal the regulation of succession?

⁵ Thus Asser, Revue, vii. p. 389, says, "Rien de plus vague en effet que l'idée d'ordre public, de morale publique, de droit public non écrit." Clunet, Jour. vii. p. 187, "Cet ordre public si peu défini et d'ailleurs si difficile à définir, cet intérêt assez vague derrière lequel on pourrait abriter le refus de reconnaître l'effet d'une loi étrangère quelconque." Clunet goes on to explain that very often there is a prejudice, which declares some particular rule as to a legal relation to be the only one that is consistent with good morals. Duguit, Jour. xii. p. 371, "Nous rencontrons ainsi à chaque pas cette notion vague et flottante de l'ordre public et des bonnes mœurs. On est souvent porté à l'exagérer." Vavasseur (Jour. ii. p. 9) asks, "Qu'est ce que l'ordre public? Chose assez variable. Vanité nationale!" Cf. Folleville, Naturalisation, p. 472. Even Laurent, 3, No. 378, says, "C'est un amalgame de principes qui se heurtent et se combattent." And Weiss, p. 517, remarks, "La notion d'ordre public est par elle-même si obscure, si incertaine."

Fusinato takes advantage of this general discussion to enter upon a criticism and an interpretation of the 12th Article of the Statute Book for Italian citizens, which is not very happily expressed. He very properly expresses the opinion that in formulating a principle for a statute book one must be very cautious. That which pleases him most (p. 89) is that which was recently enunciated by Fr. Mommsen (Archiv. f. d. Civile Praxis, 61, p. 202, § 19), viz. "Foreign law is not to be applied if its application is excluded by native law, either by the express letter of the same or by its end and object."⁷ But in making an application of this formula, Fusinato passes over on to the ground of the German theory: it is the end and object of the law, i.e. the nature of the subject that is to determine.⁸

More satisfactory than Fusinato's attempt to define exactly the idea of those laws that stand in a hostile attitude to all foreign laws is Brocher's attempt in the same direction.⁹ He proposes to make a distinction between the law of Ordre Public Interne and that of Ordre Public International. It is only the latter that is to bear the exclusive character of which we have spoken, whereas the former is to give place to foreign law when it is at variance with it, and is to apply only to the subjects of its own State, but is to accompany these subjects even when they go abroad. It is true that Brocher has omitted to define with any exactness the criteria by which his distinction is to be tested. But it is undeniably correct, and, as numerous examples given by Brocher himself show, it leads inevitably¹⁰

¹⁰ Weiss, pp. 516 et seq., has attached himself to Brocher's view; but as Fiore (§ 28) had already done, he deprecates a more thorough characterisation of the law of Ordre Public International, but much prefers to leave the decision to the discretion of the judge. But that is a declaration of the bankruptcy of the whole concern. It is quite permissible, in setting up a theory, to leave the details once in a way to the discretion of the judge, but the leading principle cannot be so treated. The formula enunciated by Brocher (Nouv. Tr. No. 143, p. 348) is too vague, viz. "Il se peut que des nécessités internes, ou certains principes d'un ordre supérieur, s'opposent à ce qu'on laisse cette loi étrangère prolonger son autorité sur le territoire." What is the meaning of

to a careful consideration of the end and object of the law—whether that object can as a general rule be attained in the case of foreigners; whether it is prudent to strive to attain it in a question with foreigners; whether legal transactions concluded abroad, or that have to be implemented there, fall under its sway or not; and whether legal procedure as such shall be controlled by the end and object of the coercitive law; whether, for instance, every action arising out of some legal transaction concluded among foreigners in a foreign country must, in accordance with the spirit and aim of the law, be declined by our tribunal. In other words, Brocher's distinction is simply an application of the theory of the German school, which rests on Wächter and Savigny, not very clearly expounded.

THE PROMOTION OF INTERNATIONAL LAW.

§ 31. Although we cannot affirm that the principles¹ of the new Italian school are tenable and sufficient, we must, in agreement with Brocher, pay the greatest respect to it for the manifold practical achievements which it has worked out. It is true that the foundation of the so-called personal statutes of nationality (allegiance) is to be found in the code civil, and partly too in the Austrian statute book; and, again, the rule as to the equality of natives and foreigners before the law, in relations of private law, is by no means set up for the first time in the Italian statute book. But the former of these two propositions has been, in the hands of the Italian school, set upon a deeper foundation, and carried out more logically—perhaps, as we may hereafter discover, carried too far; and a nation must get much credit for its steady adherence to the latter proposition, and for its championship of it, when we consider how long it suffered under the interference of foreigners in its political constitution. This credit is all the greater in respect that an offensive exaggeration of the idea of nationality, which in recent times has become customary in other quarters, preaches the doctrine of setting foreigners at a disadvantage, and excluding them from the country. Thus the Italian statute book, with its introductory provisions, which were conceived under Mancini's

"prolonger son effet sur un autre territoire"? He comes nearer a proper statement of the case when he says (p. 352), "S'agit-il . . . de droits isolés qu'on prétend exercer dans un pays ou ils paraissent contraires à l'ordre? on peut s'y opposer d'une manière plus absolue." We need only put "actes isolés" in place of "droits isolés," and it will be seen that we have to deal with the contrast between laws, which concern only the permanent subjects of a State, and those that are meant to bind the subditi temporarii as well.

auspices, generously and intelligently opens its country to foreigners, and even to foreign laws, without departing in the least from the requisite appreciation of its own sovereignty. And so the rich and valuable literature of private international law which we know has developed itself in Italy, although of course it is not all equally valuable;² we have to thank it for excellent general expositions of our subject, and at the same time for subtle and laborious investigations of particular points, all filled with the endeavour to reach impartially whatever is good, from whatever quarter it may present itself, all also free of any narrow spirit of nationality, and concerned to give the most impartial advancement to the general intercourse of nations, and to secure it on the basis of as wide a recognition of foreign law as possible. Finally, the kingdom of Italy has not only already concluded a series of treaties, which have furthered international intercourse, but it has taken special pains to put forward for negotiation more general treaties, with the same object.

We may notice as general expositions of our subjects, apart on the one side from the works we have already mentioned, which are rather devoted to a discussion of principles,³ and on the other from the various discussions on particular points,⁴ which we shall mention hereafter, the following, viz:—

(1.) Pasquale Fiore,⁵ Diritto Internazionale privato, 2nd ed. Firenze, 1874 (643 pp. small octavo), a copious work, which makes a thorough use of foreign literature, and commends itself by its thoughtful judgments, and also by its practical views. These latter characteristics are also found in a clearly and concisely conceived work by

(2.) Giovanni Lomonaco, Trattato di diritto internazionale privato, 1 vol. large octavo, 232 pages.

The most comprehensive work⁶ which we possess on international law, the work of the famous Belgian law professor Laurent,⁷ in eight volumes, adheres to the principles of the Italian school, and that in a most animated style. The learned author makes an extraordinarily copious use of the literature of the subject, especially that of France and of the Netherlands, reviews the historical foundations of our subject, and undertakes the task of tracing to its foundation every single argument that is adduced for any particular view. This talented work is full of instruction in many

² It is natural that when, as has been the case in Italy with international law, a school of law begins to exercise quite a special power of attraction, a number of immature or borrowed works enlarge the tale of its literature, without in truth enriching it. But such works have their use; they bear witness at least to the living interest of the nation, or at least of the cultured in the subjects which are so often treated.

⁴ Here, for instance, we may be reminded of the works of Carle, Norsa, Vidari, de Rossi, and others.

⁶ At the same time, this work does not contain the law of process.

directions; it surprises one by its exposition of new points of view and of excellent arguments. It is in truth a marvellous work, and every one who proposes nowadays to take up private international law in a comprehensive way must have respect for it, and esteem it sincerely. But, at the same time, the work is not without its dangers. The author, who in spite of his reading is often entangled in the bonds of the French statute book, sometimes finds it difficult to be fair to other men's arguments⁸ and points of view, and to be just in his historical judgment,⁹ and his criticisms are not free from prejudice and from political, national, and ecclesiastical antipathies. He is fond of compressing his arguments¹⁰ into certain comprehensive expressions,¹¹ and then of working with these in a broad and an unexpected fashion, as e.g. with the words Feudalism (feodalité) and Realism. The abundant store of clever and startling thoughts, which, however, are frequently not properly sifted, and look as if they had suddenly occurred to him, give the learned author not infrequent opportunities of confusing the problems which he states, and making their solution more doubtful than it really is,¹² or of struggling after absolutely new and surprising results, in place of the old and tried solutions. Then, again, the author thrusts in long political, social and ecclesiastical discussions, which can hardly be said to belong to the subject, and seems likely to lose himself in repetitions. If these discussions had been omitted, and the book taken a shorter and more concise form, the reading of it would have been less troublesome, and the work would have gained in value.¹³

Durand's shorter work also follows the principles of the Italian school, but it avoids Laurent's exaggerations and condensed phraseology, and is further remarkable for the shortness and pregnancy of expression, as well as for its clearness of thought, and for a certain practical good sense, while Bard's¹⁴ work does not propose to enter on a discussion of fundamental principles, but, taking its stand on certain recognised general rules, it supplies some excellent investigations in points of detail, which are sharply and clearly formulated.

Weiss' work is a prominent treatise, resting again upon the principles of the Italian school, which is modestly described by its author as "Traité

⁸ Cf. e.g. his peculiar arguments, i. § 417, iv. § 215, vi. § 221.

¹⁰ Cf. e.g. what he says on the rule, "locus regit actum," and the forms of the marriage ceremony.

¹¹ Thus, for instance, the divergence of opinions on a very difficult and complicated case (the case of Bauffremont) is used as an argument (i. § 3) to show that there is no science of international law at all.

elementaire de droit international" in spite of its rich contents, which are to a considerable extent given over to a comparison of different systems of law. The special features of this work are a clear and concise conception of ideas, a thorough application of literature, and especially that of the French judicatures, practical good sense, and a healthy regard for the necessities of commerce.

The most modern French literature¹⁵ is also very rich in detailed discussions¹⁶ on the problems of our subject. That most excellently edited Journal de droit International privé,¹⁷ which was founded in 1874, by Clunet, and is so rich in materials, has contributed in a most marked degree to this growth of literature. It contains original articles, literary notices, and reports of judgments from the courts of all civilised countries, all very practically arranged. It is impartial and international in the best sense. These latter characteristics one may justly claim to the same degree for the Revue de droit International et de législation comparée, which has appeared since 1869, founded by Asser, Westlake, and Rolin-Jaquemyns, and now edited by them along with Rivier. It must be admitted that it is not so rich in original papers and in reports of decided cases as the Journal de droit International privé, because it serves at the same time for the law of nations and for public law generally; on the other hand, the literary criticisms and the notices which it supplies are very complete.

There are also two scientific societies, which were both founded in 1873 at Brussels, which are occupied with private international law, viz. the Association pour la réforme et la codification du droit des gens (open to all), which is in the custom of publishing annually in London a "Report of the Annual Conference;" and the Institut de droit international, which consists only of a limited number of scientific brethren from different countries. Up to this time (April 1888), besides its original meeting at Ghent, held eleven meetings in different countries of Europe (Belgium, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Italy and the German Empire), and has published its works, deliberations, and resolutions in the Annuaire de l'Institut de droit International.^{18 19}

¹⁷ Clunet's short illustrative, and critical remarks on the reports of decided cases are worthy of the best attention.

¹⁸ Besides, the Revue is the organ of the Institute.

¹⁹ Cf. the statistical information in the Annuaire, vii. pp. 290 et seq. and ix. pp. 393 et seq.

The comparative science of law or jurisprudence is, of course, an important auxiliary study to that of private international law. The Bulletin de le Société de législation comparée (Paris 1872, 16 vols. up to this date), and the Annuaire de législation comparée publié par la Société de législation comparée (Paris 1872, et seq.), are the most important works for modern times. The periodical edited by Bernhöft, Cohn, and Kohler, which appears in Germany, treating of comparative jurisprudence (1879 et seq.), has, up to this time, paid less attention to the law of modern times.

E. PRINCIPLES OF THE PROJECTED INQUIRY.

OUTLINE OF PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW PROCEEDING ON THESE PRINCIPLES.

§ 32. It is now possible and practical to sketch more sharply the principles by which the enquiry that lies before us will be conducted.

In the first place, we are, as we have already explained, of the opinion that to pay regard to foreign rules of law to a certain extent is the legal duty of every State, and is not a matter of mere caprice and goodwill—the duty of every State, that is, which wishes to maintain the commercial relations of civilised peoples. If now and again the word comitas is still used for the considerations on which the application of foreign rules of law ought to depend, that is rather a difference of expression than of real meaning.

Private international law, then, as it is to be inferred from what has been already said, is not a product merely of the sovereign legal system of each particular State, but is a result of the nature of the subject itself, claiming recognition as in a sense necessary, a result of the requirements of commerce, and of the reciprocal recognition of their legal systems by the different States. No doubt each individual State may to a certain extent permit itself to deviate from the rules of international law, and these deviations, however perverse they may be, are for the time positive law for that State, which can be carried out so far as the sphere of its power in fact extends.¹ But capricious deviations of this kind generally bring great disadvantages in their train, even for the State which allows itself to practise them. They are not truly law, any more than the deviations from the law of nations in its technical sense, i.e. public international law, which a State may allow itself to practise, are law, although it may see that these deviations are carried out, so far as its own power extends, by its officials and official machinery against private persons.

The material principle of private international law, as we have figured it, requires no further sanction from special statutes or international treaties, because the nature of the subject, by its inherent reasonableness as a principle, will obtain recognition and prevail by its own strength. But that principle may no doubt be modified in many points by the law of custom and special treaties. The principle is simply the nature of the subject, in the sense in which we are assisted to recognise it by means of traditions and propositions of customary laws, which serve as landmarks and finger-posts. It is possible that without such assistance we should be left too much to grope about among uncertainties. But, fortunately, they are not altogether wanting; e.g. there is the proposition that foreigners, as a general rule, have full legal capacity in the relations of private law; there is the rule locus regit actum; and specially there is the proposition that legal process is not meant to create new rights or to destroy existing rights, but merely to declare rights which already exist: with the aid of this proposition, we ensure protection of vested rights.

But in our enquiry we must not start from the idea of the "legal relation." To do so would be to proceed in a circle. For in order to know whether certain facts present or bring into existence a legal relation, we must measure them by some particular statute or rule of law as the regulative authority on the subject; that is to say, we must know beforehand the rule of law or statute by which they are to be controlled, and that is precisely the thing which for the time we do not know. Accordingly, Savigny's much used proposition as to the seat of the legal relation, is in itself as wrong and as misleading as the theory of vested rights which he himself attacks. We must rather start from pure facts or from legal relations, the existence of which does not depend on their being recognised by private international law, relations which are supplied to us by the law of nations in its narrower sense of public law. Now, if we start from that point—and it is a proposition of the law of nations that every State has a certain territory—the facts we require can only be, first, the actual place where a person is found; and, second, the actual place where a thing is found in the territory: to these we add the legal relation of the law of nations, that persons stand to States not merely in that relation which is produced by their actual local situation, but also in a relation of permanent loyalty on their side, and a certain permanent protective care on the side of the State to which they belong: a relation which is not dissolved by a temporary or merely passing stay in another State. In other words, the local situation of a person or a thing, and the citizenship or domicile² of a person (which of these two relations is to be decisive, we leave undetermined at present), are the only criteria on which the determination of the questions with which we are here concerned can be founded, if we wish to avoid falling into a circulus vitiosus. The idea of an "act"³ is not at this point within our reach, and for this reason. We cannot determine a priori whether this or that sum of a man's movements—capable as it is of infinite sub-division, but also capable of being at pleasure considered as an unity, along with all its antecedent conditions and its consequences, which again in the same way may be united or divided at pleasure—is in a juristic sense an unity, or an act. We can only learn this by trying it by the test of some particular positive law or statute, and that is precisely the thing of which we are in search.⁴

² The domicile of a person is in the same way a condition of the possibility of a private international law, and not a consequence of it.

There is only one act⁵ of which we make an exception, and it, by its very nature, is assigned to the territory of some particular State: that is procedure: procedure is truly an act of the court, and every court by public law belongs to a particular State and its sphere of law. The local situation and the citizenship (or domicile) of persons, the place of things and the place of legal procedure, or of the particular lawsuit, as the case may be, are then the facts on which alone the determination of the competency of the different legal systems or legal authorities can be made to depend.

The fact that, as a general rule, a person or a thing, by changing his or its local situation, comes under the dominion of a different territorial system of law and legal authorities, by no means justifies us in inferring that he or it is subjected at once to all those various rules of law which are in force in this territory. That inference is no more legitimate than to suppose that it follows, from the ideal relation of subjection which is based upon the nature of a legal process, that the material law which prevails at the seat of the court must necessarily control the legal relation which is in debate before it. On the contrary, what we must say is this: the local situation has the effect of placing persons and things within the grasp of all those rules of law, the object of which is to seize upon all persons and things that by any means whatever are found on their territory. There are certain rules of law which, no doubt, attach themselves to all persons and things at once, the moment they enter upon their territory, as, for instance, the rules of law which concern the immediate protection of persons and things against crime, and those which are concerned with the maintenance of the state of possession in things, and so on. But, in the case of other rules of law, we should give them an absurd application if we were to assert they are to be brought into force

⁴ If, as we proceed, we speak for shortness' sake of the law of the place where the act is done, that means the law of the place in which a person was when he spoke the words that are alleged to be decisive, or wrote them, and so on.

simply because the persons or things, as the case may be, have come into the territory. In such cases we must rather assume that the legal relations which were established by their former local situation, and the system of law that prevailed there, are to continue in spite of the change of locality. This is the true meaning of the theory of vested rights in private international law, although, no doubt, it is a narrow meaning. We cannot exalt this theory to the rank of a fundamental principle, and we cannot go so far as to say that a legal relation is to be recognised and upheld everywhere, even if we assume that its origin falls to be adjudicated upon by some particular system of law which approves of it. The contrary is proved by the familiar instance of the refusal of countries, in which slavery does not prevail, to recognise the relation of master and slave which has originated in another country. But this much is true: if we desire a regular intercourse with foreign countries, if we are minded to recognise the legal system of these countries within their own territory, we are barred from saying that, because a thing or a person which formerly was present in a foreign country, fell under or entered into some particular legal relation in accordance with the system of law which prevailed there, and because the same result would not have happened, or happened in the same way, in our own country, therefore we refuse to recognise that legal relation.⁶ We must, then, when we have to deal with some question of private international law, that is to say, with a case in which there may come to be a question as to the application of a foreign law, or of the laws of different territories, put the points more exactly, thus: First, what are the facts which can possibly be brought into consideration for the decision of the legal point; and, second, in what territory the things or persons, as the case may be, with which the legal relation is concerned, were at those points of time at which each of these facts came into operation, or in the case of persons, to what territory they belonged at those points of time, either by virtue of their allegiance or of their domicile, as the case may be?

Thus it may no doubt happen that the legal relation which is brought up for decision is, in truth, the product of a whole series of influences, each subject to a different territorial system of law.⁷ The chief difficulty in determining questions that belong to private international law lies in the separation of these successive influences one from the other, and in the solution at the same time of all the difficulties that have been created by the different systems of law, the last of which is presented by the institution of the process,⁸ or it may be the execution of the decree.⁹ For instance, a right of pledge is validly constituted over a thing which happens to be in territory A, according to the law of A; the thing is subsequently brought into the territory of State B, and here the owner, who lives in this State, becomes bankrupt; the right of pledge itself is to be tested by the laws of State A, while the rights of preference in the bankruptcy are to be tested by the laws of State B. For, as regards these rights of preference, we have to deal with the effects which subsequent legal circumstances, developed after the thing came into State B, have had upon the right of pledge already constituted. And in every case that legal system, with all its effects, to which the thing by its actual local situation is subject in the later stages, or in the last, as the case may be, must be allowed the precedence. So that, in the ultimate resort—and on this point all are agreed—the result which the law of the tribunal really desires is that which must prevail.¹⁰ The reason of this is that, in every practical decision, the question is not about a right which once on a time existed, or at some future time may come to exist by some change of locality, but about a right which is or is not to be found in existence at the moment; and so the law, under whose jurisdiction the question last falls, will always have a preponderating voice in its decision.¹¹ But, of course, it may be that the last change of locality, or many of the changes, are unimportant and inconsiderable because it cannot possibly be supposed that any circumstances of legal importance occurred subsequently to these changes. For instance, some one has acquired a thing in A, and then has simply carried it about with him on a journey, in the course of which there has been no change of possession, and has brought it back again with him to A or to X, where it is proposed to claim it from him. In this case the law of A or of X may be taken into account, but not the law of any one of the intermediate places. From all this it will be seen how inappropriate and confusing the figure, which Savigny uses, of the discovery of the seat of a legal relation, is. In very many ⁸ A process does not, it is true, require the presence of the person or thing in the territory of the court; but this exception simply rests upon the fact that by modern law the principle of the so-called direct representation is recognised. This is, in truth, a fiction, of which the older Roman law knew nothing, since it treated the procurator as the party, and only in a roundabout way brought the results of the process back again to the true original parties.

⁶ In so far as it is possible for the true theory as such to be laid down in a statute book, this has been done in the revised statute book for Zürich of 1887, § 1. "The private law of Zürich binds, primarily and solely, persons, natives or foreigners, who live in the Canton of Zürich or are temporarily present there, or seek a legal remedy there; and it controls all private relations which come into operation in the country, except in so far as the peculiar nature of the special legal relation requires either the application of a foreign law upon this territory, or the extension of the law of this territory to a foreign country." The first part of this paragraph would be better deleted.

⁹ Thus also Westlake, very truly, says, § 178: What alone private international law gives or can give is a rule "depending on the total result obtained by appreciating each fact in the case according to the law appropriate to it." Westlake, in opposition to the prevailing doctrine of English jurisprudence, makes this very proper application of what he has said, that the question as to the legitimacy of a child is not to be determined by the lex rei sitæ, because in the process the final question is as to an inheritance which is to be settled according to that law, but that even for this purpose the antecedent question of the legitimacy must be determined according to the personal statute of the child or of the father, as the case may be.

¹¹ There is some agreement here with the conclusions of Torres Campos (p. 309), which in my opinion are not quite distinct. He lays stress upon the physical force of the one State or the other; but then speaks of a greater and a less physical force affecting the legal relation in such a way that the former must prevail.

cases, as we see, the legal relation has not an exclusive connection with one territorial law only, but with many,¹² and it is one of the greatest mistakes which can be committed, in solving the problems of private international law, to refer the whole series of questions connected with any concrete legal problem to the law of the territory that governs the last of the series, for no better reason than that it is the last of the series that is so governed.¹³ The following considerations may serve to clear up the great problem of private international law.

In ancient times the legal authorities of the different States maintained a strictly exclusive attitude one to another, something like different spheres, which demolish everybody that passes into them from another sphere, or resolve it into its constituent atoms. As a matter of principle, they refused to recognise the legal stamp which a person or thing had acquired in another State. This is the view which lies at the bottom of the deliverances of the Roman law as to persons or things that come into the power of "hostes." In modern times all this is changed. Men desire an orderly and peaceable intercourse with each other, and on that account, as a matter of principle, they recognise the legal stamp which a foreign country has impressed on a person or thing, while that person by his allegiance or his domicile, as the case may be, and the thing by its local situation, belonged to that foreign country. But this recognition, as matter of principle, of the legal stamp or character which has been impressed by the foreign law, does not of course prevent the person or thing in question from being subjected to the influence of the legal system of our country, if the conditions necessary for that subjection are present. In other words, what we have to ascertain is the effect to be given to each of the legal systems concerned, which shall correspond to the nature of the subject under consideration, in conformity with the local situation, or the domicile of the person in question (or it may be in conformity with his allegiance or the law of the tribunal that is trying the case).¹⁴ This principle of decision according to the nature of the subject is not any capricious discovery, and is no mere theory; it is really recognised law, although perhaps in many cases it may be difficult to ascertain with certainty. Could it possibly be said that a decision contrary to the nature of the subject—an exaggerated application of the native law, it may be, of the tribunal that has cognizance of the case, which should not correspond to the nature of the subject—was law, or better law than what we have proponed as the law? We can conceive how much mischief might be done by a system of law which should undertake to settle questions of international law by special enactments, not in accordance with the nature of the subjects with which it had to deal. We can also see how cautiously international treaties should be concluded, these treaties from which so many persons, accustomed exclusively to lean upon the crutch of positive enactments, expect that the true progress of private international law is to come. As soon as we pass beyond a few general, and therefore vague propositions, and out of the region of a few subjects, which lend themselves more easily to an arbitrary regulation (e.g. copyright, patent right, regulations as to citizenship, etc.), we discover how much harm may be brought about by an attempt to fix details upon a theory which is not clearly conceived, to say nothing of the case where the theory is entirely wrong. This will lead invariably to determinations contrary to the nature of the subject, that is to say, contrary to the logic of legal institutes, and directly opposed to the requirements of commerce.

¹² Consider, too, this example, viz.: A, who, like his son, is a citizen of State X, finds himself with his son in the territory of State Y; the law of State X will decide whether A still has paternal authority over his son, but the law of State Y will decide whether in virtue of that authority he can throw his son into gaol.

¹³ This mistake is committed by the older writers, and partly at the present day by the jurisprudence of England and North America, in cases where the final problem concerns a real right in an immovable article. In this connection it is frequently committed by Haus, cf. e.g. § 146 ad fin. and § 147.

In truth, very few legal topics stand so little in need of detailed regulation by enactment as private international law. Those countries, in which it is committed in substance to the care of scientific jurisprudence and practice, have little cause to envy such countries as France, where jurisprudence and the practice of the courts have to maintain a fight in the interests of commerce, and even of the French legal system, against legislative enactments which in part are faulty. The Italian legislature, with a wise self-restraint, in many points rather hints at the principles than completely sketches them.

COMPARISON OF THESE PRINCIPLES WITH THOSE OF THE NEW ITALIAN SCHOOL.

§ 33. Our conception of private international law, we must admit, stands in opposition to some extent to that of the modern Italian school. There is perhaps an inclination to object that a theory, which proposes to treat persons and things according to the same principles, is not a worthy or a correct conception. But let it be observed that, even according to the theory maintained by us, this well-marked distinction exists, that in the case of the person it is not merely the actual local situation, but the sets foot on another territory.) We may, in truth, speak of a second or counter stamping. Hamaker, in his treatise, "Das Internationale Privatrecht, seine Ursachen und Ziele" (p. 25), overlooks this.

allegiance (or domicile, as the case may be), which is already in existence, that has been described as possibly the decisive element in very many aspects. Again, it may well be that the legal systems which have to be taken into account, will with one voice describe the place of the thing or things with which we happen to be dealing as irrelevant for certain legal consequences, so that the things are, for instance, regarded as an annexum of the person, who up to a particular day was undoubtedly in right of them. Or it may be that, without regard to the place of the thing, they with one voice will pronounce the will of a particular person to be decisive as to the fate of the thing. In this way the preponderating force of the so-called personal statute will display itself. But truly this is not an inference from any abstract principle of international law, which cannot be proved to be true: it is a deduction from the meaning and the spirit of the particular territorial systems of law which are concerned. If this spirit changes, the practical results of private international law must change with it. If, for instance, the Italian statute book should again give up the principle of an universal succession in the law of inheritance, and should betake itself again to the principle of the older law of succession known to the German law, with a distinction between immoveable and moveable property, the new Italian doctrine would certainly not be able to prevent the lex rei sitæ from asserting its supremacy in the determination of questions of succession in immoveable property in Italian practice. The principle of private international law must be so conceived that, assuming the recognition of foreign legal systems in their own domain as a fundamental proposition, and assuming also the recognition of the legal capacity of foreigners, it shall be able to explain different historical developments, and even the possibility of contemporaneous divergencies in development, where the domestic legislation of a State differs widely from the usual rule, as, for instance, in the case of the law of England and of North America. But the Italian school fails in this, that it cuts the principle of international law too fine for the present state of those countries where the theory of the Roman law is still supreme, and too fine sometimes even for the theory of the Code Civil,¹⁵ of which the Italian statute book presents a new edition, although it has been in many ways undoubtedly improved or modified.

But in reality the division of the whole law into personal statutes and laws of public order is in many cases, where particular cases are investigated, a mere formula or fashion. The authors of the new school, who give us the more thorough discussions of the various subjects, make the true object of their investigation the meaning and the spirit of the particular laws which they have to consider. They ask themselves, for instance, what would be the consequences, if the adjudicating court should or should not apply its own domestic law to some legal act done in another country—a marriage, for instance, or a divorce—that is to say, they decide according to the "nature of the subject." We find, then, in the most careful and thorough authors, that their results do not differ from those that will be attained by following our method. German jurisprudence is not infrequently led astray by Savigny's erroneous illustration of the "seat of the legal relation," by means of which, as has been said, we can prove everything and nothing.¹⁶ The new school of Italy, France, and Belgium, however, sometimes is exposed to the temptation of preferring an appeal to that formula which they have set up to a thorough and calm consideration of the whole subject. This is particularly the case with Laurent.

OUTLINE OF A THEORY OF PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW.

§ 34. The following sketch of legal principles in their international aspects will serve to show clearly what are the problems of private international law and the method of solving these, which we propose to follow. But it must be noted that detailed inquiry will alone solve the question, what particular legal propositions belong to this or to that branch of the subject, and this outline cannot be directly employed to determine particular legal problems. This remark suggests a further observation, that in strictness there should be a special inquiry into the international relations of each separate rule of law: such a task, however, would never be brought to an end, so infinite is the list of rules of law, and so constant are the changes in the law itself. Most rules of law, however, are merely logical deductions from general principles, for even new positive enactments are logically and historically bound up with others, and thus we can by a natural process pass from the international aspects of one rule of law to those of another which is akin to it. But though such a process is permissible, it is as little possible to lay down general rules for it, as it is to say generally how the language of statutes is to be read. Interpretation, as Savigny remarks, is an art to be applied to each case by itself. Our task must therefore be considered to have been exhausted if, in the course of the enquiry, we shall discuss those prominent questions of detail which have been found of special importance in international intercourse, and with which the authors on the subject, as well as the long list of judgments that are before us, are principally concerned.

Finally, it should not be left unnoticed that in some points a special law of custom has modified the logical deduction from the nature of the subject, and of course all reference to this law of custom, just because it concerns merely isolated points, belongs to the special inquiry into the various branches of the subject.

The laws which concern the incapacity of certain persons to act,¹

¹⁶ Could we not, for instance, even go so far as to say that, where a suit is depending before a particular court, the seat of the legal relation is in that court? Against this theory of "the seat of legal relations," see particularly Mancini, Journal, i. p. 287.

have for their object merely to provide a permanent protection for these persons. In conformity, therefore, with the nature of this subject and the object of the laws that are concerned with it, subjects of our State remain under the sway of our laws, although they may be temporarily resident in a foreign State, and remain so in respect of all their property, even although it may lie in a foreign country. On the other hand, this object cannot be attained in the case of strangers who have only a temporary residence in our State, or happen to have property there. Subjects of our State, therefore, will be treated before our courts as of no contracting capacity, even although they may have entered into contracts abroad; and, conversely, strangers will never be treated as incapable of contracting by our courts, because, according to our laws, they would not possess such capacity.²

The object of laws relating to things can only be attained if either the law of things that prevails in the domicile of the parties interested, or that which prevails at the place where the transaction takes place, are left out of account; but, at the same time, the design of the legislator can only reasonably have reference to property that is situated within his territory, and so the lex rei sitæ alone rules.

In the law of obligations, in so far as it deals with legal transactions, those rules of law, which will not give way to the desire of the parties to dispense with them, are to be distinguished from those which do not come upon the scene except when parties have failed to declare their desire to be otherwise, a thing which does not always require to be expressly done.

The rules of law of the former kind have, as a general rule, the protection of the debtor as their object: thus as a rule we must assume that their object is that they shall be applied to obligations, which have been undertaken by natives to foreigners even when in a foreign country. But this is only a general rule, which necessarily suffers very many exceptions. For it may be that we should attribute a less absolute character to this measure of protection. We may have to say: other facts and circumstances exist in the foreign country, as to which the foreign system of law is the best judge, and an appeal to the restraining domestic law of our subject, as against an obligation which he has assumed in a foreign country, may possibly be contrary to the bona fides of the rules of commerce. In this way a judge even of our own country may sometimes come to the conclusion that an enactment of his own law, which so confines the desire of the parties, is not applicable to the case of a legal transaction on which a citizen has entered in a foreign country; while it is quite reasonable to suppose that a foreign judge will come all the sooner to that conclusion, if there is no such restrictive provision in his own law. On the other hand, the character of a provision which so restrains the wills of the parties may be so absolute that we are forced to declare that this provision has application to all obligations, wherever and between whomsoever they may be entered on, if any attempt is made to enforce them before our courts.

As far as legal rules of the second kind are concerned, the parties may as a matter of bargain subject themselves to any territorial law they choose. If all such declaration is wanting—a declaration which may, no doubt, be inferred from the actings of parties—then again the nature of the subject must decide. That is to say, we must enquire what law the parties would probably have had in view, if they had considered the matter reasonably.

Obligations ex delictis arise from offences against public order in the proper sense; this public order must rule in its own territory, without respect to any other considerations. These obligations, therefore, as a matter of principle, are subject to the place where the act was done.

The aim which the law of the family has before it can only be attained if the subjects of our State, even when temporarily absent abroad, remain under its authority; and conversely, it would never be attained if it were to be applied to persons that do not permanently belong to our State, and are only temporarily resident in it. The law of the home, therefore, claims authority in such questions.

According to the axioms of Roman law, the heir represents the person of his predecessor in all legal questions relating to his property. This entire personality, with all the relations attaching to the property, can, as a legal conception, exist only at the centre of its legal activity, and therefore only at the domicile of the person, or in the State to which he permanently belongs. The transmission, therefore, of the legal person of the predecessor to the heir takes place according to the law of succession prevailing at the domicile or the home of the predecessor. On the contrary, by the conception of English law, the law of succession, so far as immovables are concerned, is merely a special variety of the law of acquiring things; and therefore by English law the lex rei sitæ rules.

The law of process prescribes the conditions and the forms under which the sovereign power of the State shall set itself in motion to ascertain and to vindicate private rights. And from this the converse follows, that the State will not set itself in motion under any other conditions or forms, and therefore, in questions of process, the law of the place where the tribunal is, is to be applied.

APPENDIX I.

LAWS OF INDEPENDENT STATES, AND PARTICULAR SYSTEMS OF LAW WITHIN THE BOUNDARIES OF ONE STATE.

§ 35. We have already noticed that private international law has also to concern itself with the fact of different territorial legislatures, and different systems of law, being recognised within the boundaries of one

State. The question may be asked whether any problem requires a different answer in such a case from the answer it will get in a case where the laws of different independent States are the subject for consideration.

This question¹ is answered by the older authors almost without exception in the negative. Sometimes this is by implication, in respect that they take the examples which they select for use now from different particular systems of law in one and the same State, and again from the different laws of separate States, and decide both on the same principles.² Sometimes they answer the question expressly;³ and in modern times the overwhelming majority of authors express themselves to the same effect.⁴ Feuerbach,⁵ Puchta,⁶ Pütter,⁷ Maillher de Chassat,⁸ and especially Wächter,⁹ demand an entirely different treatment for the particular laws of the same State, and the laws of different States.

No reasons are for the most part given by the supporters of either the one opinion or the other. The supporters of the latter opinion do not, as a general rule, say wherein the difference consists; only Puchta, Feuerbach, and Wächter express themselves somewhat more distinctly.

Different particular systems of law may arise within one and the same State in three different ways:—

First, A territory which formerly was independent, or belonged to another State, is incorporated with the State in question.

Second, The State authority concedes autonomy to a certain extent to a particular district.

Third, The one State authority passes a law applicable only to a particular division of the country.

In the case of the incorporation of an entire State or of a province, in the first place, the supreme administrative and legislative authority passes to the State which acquires it. The functions of those factors which have up to this time made up the supreme power of the incorporated State are extinguished with it, and, as a matter of public law, from this time onwards the incorporated territory is represented by the State which acquires it. No other changes, however, are matters of course; they rather depend on the provisions which the acquiring State has made—possibly, too, they may depend on the conditions under which the acquisition took place.¹⁰ This practice of public law, which has been followed in the most recent times,¹¹ allows the acquired territory to pass over into the possession of the State which has acquired it, for all the purposes of public law as a whole, with all its legal system complete, although it does not by any means forbid a gradual approximation of the legal condition of the one State to that of the other. The opposite view could only be carried out in a case where the legal conditions of a country were in a very primitive state. Indeed it points at the acquisition of territory under public law being treated on the same principles as the acquisition of an estate under the rules of private law. If the same person acquires two estates, which up to that time belonged to different owners, the special legal relations, such as servitudes, which up to that time belonged to the one as against the other, are no doubt extinguished. But if, putting aside the supreme power of the constitution, the legal system of the incorporated State remains standing, while of course that of the incorporating State also does so, each must continue to possess the same force and meaning in its relations towards the laws of other territories that differ from its own, for if it did not it would have suffered a change. Legal propositions which imply the rejection of all other legal systems, the so-called coercitive laws, such as the proposition that no compulsitor can be used to enforce an undertaking to marry, do not cease to have their full effect, either in the one territory or the other, merely because both territories are united under the same supreme authority. In the first case, then, which we have put, the theory which proposes to assign a peculiar treatment to the laws of the provinces of an empire, must be rejected as in contradiction of the proposition to which reference has just been made.

In the second case, the case where an autonomy has been specially constituted, the particular district will be recognised by the supreme authority of the whole empire State as independent, in so far as the law in question is concerned. It follows, from this independence, that in the case in question a province will be regarded in the same light as an independent foreign State, and we must return the same answer to the question in this case as we did in the first case, and as we must do in the third case, the case, that is, where some particular law is enacted by the State as applicable to a particular district only.

What looks like an exception must be recognised in the first case, viz.

when the application of some rule of law is made to depend on the person whose rights are in question being a native or a foreigner. All the inhabitants of the newly acquired province are regarded as subjects of the State, and therefore, in the case in question, a different rule of law from that formerly applied comes into play. But this is no alteration of the rule itself, it is merely an alteration in the circumstances of the individual who is concerned.

English practice offers numerous examples of the law of a dependent province or colony being treated on the same footing as the law of a foreign country.¹² Judgments pronounced in Scotland, for instance, are not recognised in England as English judgments;¹³ and in a well-known case a married man, who had obtained a divorce from a Scottish court and afterwards had married again, was condemned for bigamy because the English court did not recognise that divorce.¹⁴

In the territories of the Russian empire, too, various territorial systems of law are in force, but one does not observe that any distinction is taken between these various provincial systems of law and the laws of foreign States.¹⁵ In such matters, German practice recognises no distinction apart from the question as to the execution of decrees.¹⁶ But on this subject of execution certain considerations of reciprocity and retaliation come into play, which are truly of the character of matters of public law.¹⁷

The arguments against our view used by Pütter and Mailher de Chassat are quite vague, particularly as neither of them ever points out in what the difference of treatment in the two classes of cases consists.

¹² An interesting decision of the Court of Cassation at Turin, on 27th March 1885, corresponding entirely with this view, is reported in the Journal, xiii. p. 617. [By the Judgment Extension Act of 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 54), judgments of the Supreme Courts of one of Scotland, England, or Ireland, will have the effect of judgments of the Supreme Courts of the other two if duly registered, as directed by the Act, in the other two territories. This enactment applies to decrees in absence as well as to decrees in foro, unless when the decree in absence is pronounced in Scotland after jurisdiction has been founded by arrestment.]

¹³ Burge, iii. p. 1057.

¹⁴ Burge, i. p. 672. [Lolley's case, 1812. Russ and Ryan, p. 237.] The judgments of the Court of Cassation at Paris of 18th Thermidor, anno 12, and 12th August 1812 (Sirey, xii. 1, p. 73, and xiii. 1, p. 226), are to the same effect. The first is to the effect that the union of two countries in one State does not make judgments pronounced in one of them before the union capable of execution in the other, and the second to the effect that the union of two countries under the same sovereign in the same way does not touch this question, although the judgments in both countries run in the name of the same sovereign. A judgment of the Supreme Court at Berlin, of 5th August 1841 (Decisions, ix. pp. 381-391): "According to § 4 of the introduction to the Prussian A.L.R., the subject of a foreign State, if he lives in Prussia, is to be judged by its laws, and if two different systems of law are in force in different parts of Prussia, the obligation of reparation is to be regulated by that system under which the act which caused the damage took place."

¹⁵ See the paper by Lehr: "De la force obligatoire de la législation civile russe au point de vue du droit international" (Jour. iv. p. 205).

¹⁶ See, below, the doctrine of the execution of judgments.

According to Feuerbach, a provincial system of law is given, not to the province as a geographical district, but to its inhabitants, and the geographical boundaries are only named in so far as by them a certain section of the subjects of the State, on whom these laws are to be obligatory, is intended to be described. According to this view, a measure of police confined to a province would affect none but inhabitants who were domiciled there, and the inhabitants of the other provinces might transgress it with impunity: the system of personal laws would be recognised in the case of provincial systems of law differing from each other.

Puchta's opinion is that, in cases of conflict between different provincial systems, that which is required by the nature of the subject is to have its full effect; whereas, where the systems of different States come into conflict, the application of the foreign law constitutes an exceptional rarity, since the judge's duty is to apply none but the law of his own people and his own State. But, in the first place, the reason why the judge applies a foreign law is not that it is the ordinance of a foreign power, but because his own legal system desires that the case in question shall be determined by foreign law. In the next place, a judge appointed to any particular province is just as much bound to apply the law that is recognised within its bounds,¹⁸ as the judge of a foreign State, in which there are no particular provincial laws, is to accommodate the rule of his decisions to the laws of his own State.

In Puchta's view, in this second case, some other principle than a decision according to the nature of the case must step in, a decision, therefore, which must either be meaningless or inconvenient.¹⁹ It will certainly not be disputed that the central authority of the State can give definite rules for the application of the different provincial systems, nor will it be disputed that such rules may grow up by a course of custom, nor that in many cases they do exist by the operation of both these causes. Thus, for instance, judgments which have been pronounced in one province or in one division of a great State are—not infrequently by the operation of a mistaken theory, or owing to too high an appreciation of the conveniences of such a course—carried into execution over a wider area than should reasonably be allowed.²⁰ But a condition of complete confusion would ¹⁸ The supreme court of the country judges its cases just as the court of first instance was bound to do. The reason assigned by Puchta (Lectures, § 113) for rejecting the application of the rule that every judge must primarily apply the law which is recognised in his own country to this case, viz. that the division of the territory into different jurisdictions under one supreme court is merely an administrative rule, which has no bearing on the conflict of laws, is therefore inapplicable. Besides, it is not invariably the case that the different provinces of a State have one supreme court.

²⁰ The subsidiary law of the North German Bund of 21st June 1869, afterwards declared to be a law of the German Empire, is so expressed, § 1. It introduces a general duty of giving assistance in all civil disputes to the court of the Bund (or Empire): "The court to which application is made is not entitled to refuse its assistance, even although it holds the jurisdiction of the arise, if we were to try to apply those principles at which Wächter in his Pandects has pointed. Rights and relations, says Wächter, which were established in one district of a State in conformity with its particular law, must be judged of according to that particular law all over the entire State: if they are properly founded, or acquired according to the law of the district, they must be recognised and protected all over the State in the same way. For it is the duty of the State to recognise and to protect every legal relation in the way in which it has been established by the aid of a particular law recognised by the State.²¹ According to the last rule, the limits even of absolute prohibitive laws, as between the constituent provinces of a State, would be destroyed; if slavery were recognised in some distant colony of an empire, it could be carried into effect in the empire State, the old civilised country, according to Wächter. But the unvarying and unanimous practice of all the European States, who used to have the institution of slavery in their colonies, contradicts this result. A slave brought from an English or a French colony to England or France, was treated as free. The right of the master, although well founded according to the law of the colony or province, was in this way not recognised in another part of the same State.^{22 23}

All those theories are simply overcome by the observation that, in private international law generally, nothing is recognised that does not correspond with the nature of the subject. Thus a theory which assumes as a matter of principle a difference in the way in which the laws of different States, and the particular laws of the same State, should be treated, can have no other foundation than this, that it proposes either in the one case or in the other something that is at variance with the nature of the subject, that is, something which is unreasonable. Besides, any such difference in principle is at variance with the fact of the manifold diversities of State constitutions which can be conceived, or which actually as facts exist.

There are composite States, to which we cannot with complete accuracy apply the conception of a union of different provinces in one State, or of a union as if of personality, or, lastly, of a federation or Bund.²⁴ In Wächter's court making the application not to be established;" and this in spite of the fact that (until the comprehensive judicial code of the German Empire came into operation) there was one common supreme court devoted to commercial matters.

²¹ Very properly the Court of Cassation at Rome decided (20th February 1885), that patents for discoveries could not be recognised as a matter of course in newly acquired provinces, if the patents had not been taken out according to the law of these provinces (Jour. xiii. p. 619).

²² See Story, § 96, on this subject.

²³ Even the enactment as to the constitution of the courts of the German Empire provides, § 159 ad fin.: "The request (for assistance from one court to another) is to be rejected, if the transaction which is to be undertaken is forbidden by the law of the court whose assistance is asked."

²⁴ Not one of these conceptions is applicable to the case of Austria-Hungary. See on the so-called real unions, Jellinek: "Die Lehre von den Staatenverbindungen." Wien 1882, p. 197.

view we should have to discover all sorts of intermediate theories in such cases, whereas our theory of its own accord fits into the facts of every case, and we can e.g. in the simplest way ascertain by inference what effect the existence of a supreme court must have on the question of the recognition and execution of foreign judgments in the different parts of a composite State.

It is, however, quite consistent with the theory we have adopted that a statute book, by means of express and exceptional enactments, should treat the legal systems of different provinces (or divergent rules of particular systems) differently from foreign laws. It may declare, for instance, that in one case the law of the domicile of the contracting party, who belongs to another province, is to be regarded rather than the lex loci actus, while it refuses to pay this respect to the law of the domicile of a foreign contracting party. To this category the provision of the 84th article of the general German statute²⁵ as to bills of exchange, and of the German code of procedure, Civilprozessordnung (§ 53), belong.

A supreme court, which unites different provinces under its jurisdiction, is bound to decide, as the lower court, from which the process comes, was bound to do; and if in the district of the inferior court itself there are different systems, then according to the law of the place to which the parties belonged. (See judgment of the Supreme Court of App. at Jena, 26th Oct. 1826. Seuffert, i. No. 154.)²⁶

²⁵ . . . "But a foreigner, who by the laws of his own country is not capable of incurring an obligation by bill, will be bound by undertaking such an obligation in this country, in so far as, by the law of this country, he has such a capacity." The sense of this paragraph, it must be admitted, has not been established beyond all doubt.

²⁶ In Hannover the applicability of municipal statutes on matters of private law, to districts newly attached to a town, has been often discussed, and has been answered by Francke and Laporte in the same way as in the text (Magazin für Hannoverscher Recht. 1853, p. 370. Neuer Magazin für Hannov. Recht. 1861, p. 203). Cf., too, Leonhardt, "Zur Lehre von den Rechtsverhältnissen am Grundeigenthum," Hann. 1843, p. 45. A singular exception exists with regard to the statutory rule of succession between spouses in the town of Hannover by virtue of a special Royal Ordinance of 7th Oct. 1856. Cf. judgment of the Sup. Ct. of App. at Celle, 6th Jan. 1865 (Seuffert, 19, No. 209). Further, a judgment of the App. Ct. at Flensburg 5th March 1867 (Seuffert, 21, No. 1). Judgment of the Sup. Ct. at Hamburg, of 17th June 1886 (Seuffert, 42, No. 182). "It can certainly not be asserted absolutely that when the territory of a State or of a town is extended, the principles of private law which were recognised in the original territory will be applied in the territory now added. If, on the other hand, the rule of law in question is to be construed as being intended to rule within the territory of the State or town in question, whatever that territory may at any time be, then it must be applied in the land that has now been added to the territory."

If the object of a treaty be merely to define a doubtful or obscure frontier, then, according to the order of the Prussian ministry of 29th March 1837, those Prussian laws, which are applicable to the jurisdiction to which the hitherto debatable land has been definitely annexed, will be applicable within the newly defined frontier from the date of the original publication of the treaty onwards. As I think, the soundness of such a proposition is by no means self-evident. I should be inclined to think, apart from such express enactment, that it must be left to parties, by the ordinary civil procedure, to establish what laws or legal rules have really been recognised up to that moment in the debatable ground. For an international treaty as to boundaries, although its language may be declaratory, will in itself regulate the future only, and cannot prejudice the rights of private persons in the past.

NOTE A. ON § 35. RELATIONS OF THE LEGAL SYSTEMS OF ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND.

[The courts of England and Scotland are completely independent of one another, although they have a common Supreme Court of Appeal in the House of Lords, and, although the fact of their being subject to the same sovereign allows judgments pronounced in the one country to be easily executed in the other, regulations to ensure this being enacted by the Judgments Extension Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vic. c. 54), see supra, note 12.]

Lord Chancellor Campbell (Stuart v. Stuart, 1861, 4, Macq. p. 1, Session Cases, 2nd ser. xxiii. p. 904) has said that, "as to judicial jurisdiction, Scotland and England . . . are to be considered as independent foreign countries, unconnected with each other." Lord President Inglis (Orr Ewing, 1884, Sess. Ca. 4th ser. xi. p. 601) repeats and approves of this doctrine, and it is also approved by the House of Lords in that case (1885, Sess. Ca. 4th ser. xiii. H. of L. p. 1). Lord Blackburn says (p. 17) that it may not be an accurate use of language to call them foreign countries, and Lord Fitzgerald takes the same position, but on their absolute independence of each other, in so far as their judicatories are concerned, no doubt can be cast.

In these circumstances, it is held that where the House of Lords, the common Court of Appeal for England and Scotland, is administering an English doctrine of law which is different from Scottish doctrines, or perhaps antagonistic to them, its authority is not binding on the Scottish court. The converse case will also, of course, be true. In so far as the judgment of the House, however, proceeds upon principles of general jurisprudence, it will be held to be an authority even although the case may be an appeal from the other country; and, a fortiori, if the judgment is an interpretation of a statute common to both countries, it must be recognised as an authority in both. (See Orr Ewing, ut cit. and Virtue v. Police Commissioners of Alloa, 1873, Sess. Ca. 4th ser. i. p. 285.)

It is assumed, in the reasoning by which this latter doctrine is supported, that the supreme court, in judging an English case, applies English law and practice, and, in judging a Scots appeal, the laws and practice of Scotland. It is only when the laws of the two countries are identical, or when principles of general jurisprudence are invoked, which are superior to all positive legislation or interpretative of it, that a judgment in a case proceeding from the courts of one country will be an authority to which the courts of the other must conform. It is manifest, however, that the courts of each country may often find aid, by way of analogy or illustration, from the judgments pronounced by their neighbours, just as they derive assistance from decisions of the courts of the United States or any foreign country. English decisions are more used in Scotland for this latter purpose than the judgments of foreign courts, since the principles on which they proceed, and the language in which they are expressed, are more easily and thoroughly intelligible than those of a foreign court would be.]

APPENDIX II.

ON THE SO-CALLED COERCITIVE OR PROHIBITORY LAWS.

§ 36. There is a generally recognised rule that in certain cases foreign rules of law are neither applied nor taken into consideration, that is, when they are at variance with the so-called coercitive or prohibitory laws of this country.¹ We saw that the modern school of Italy, France, and Belgium use this rule as a means of setting up a fundamental principle in private international law. But they have hardly succeeded in defining those prohibitory laws with much exactness; while Brocher and Weiss, in order to reach a sharper and more apposite definition of the idea, have set up a distinction between Ordre public interne, on the one hand, and Ordre public international on the other.² It cannot be disputed that such cases of conflict do arise; slavery, or a right of property over another person, cannot be put in force by the vindication of a person in a country in which institutions of that kind do not exist, or rather are regarded as immoral. But these cases are much less common³ than people think. In the first place, it is observed that, while our law may regard a legal relation as unwarrantable in our economical and social circumstances, the circumstances of a foreign country, differing from those of our own, may cause it to seem quite justifiable. For instance, in country A a certain rate of interest may seem usurious, which, in country B, may have its justification. It would be unjust to dismiss in country A, a suit depending on a contract to pay interest which belonged to country B, merely on the ground that the maximum rate of interest allowed in country A had been exceeded.⁴

² Codice civile Italiano disposizione sulla publ. etc. art. 14: "Notwithstanding the provision of the preceding articles, in no case can the laws, the documents, or the judgments of a foreign country, or private dispositions or contracts, derogate from the prohibitory laws of the kingdom which concern persons, things, or documents, or from laws which concern in any kind of way public order or morality." Resolutions of the institute of international law, at the Oxford Conference of 1880, No. viii. (Annuaire, 5^{ème} année, p. 57): "En aucun cas les lois d'un état ne pourront obtenir reconnaissance et effet dans le territoire d'un contre état, si elles y sont en opposition avec le droit public ou avec l'ordre public."

³ Even Phillimore, § 15 et seq., emphasises the exceptional character of these cases.

⁴ For this case, see the chapter on the law of obligations. The grounds for a divorce, in a judgment of the Supreme Tribunal of Commerce at Leipzig of 25th June 1872 (Seuffert. 27, No. 156) touch a peculiar case: they bear that, although the application of native customary law be excluded by some prohibitory enactment of the native legislature, this enactment does not extend to a foreign law of custom. The first article of the German Commercial Code has made an order of precedence only for native legal authorities, but settles no such order as between native and foreign authorities. Native and foreign authorities are necessarily mutually exclusive. We may add: What would happen if by chance the law of State A, which is completely codified, excluded on principle the application of all rules of customary law, while in State B customary law was the generally prevalent order?

The question, then, must be more sharply defined. The fact that our laws, or our legal ideas, reject the rule of law or the legal relation which another country recognises, can never prevent that rule or relation from receiving effect. The only question that can arise in any case is whether the effect of the rule of law, or of the legal relation which is to operate within the domain of our legal system, is in contradiction to absolutely imperative rules of our law, or to moral principles which obtain among us. It is just at this point that it is specially important to observe that, as we have already pointed out, a legal relation need not necessarily belong exclusively to any one territory, but may very possibly in its operation branch out into several different territories. Our rights are always confined to this, that we may treat as non-existent, cut off and put out of sight, those branches and offshoots only which come to light on our territory. The trunk of the tree, which is rooted in a foreign system of law, is beyond our power, and if the branch or offshoot, which came into existence in this country, had no power to produce any mischievous results, if it could not come into conflict with our legal system, it would be wrong and unjust to destroy it, simply because the trunk from which it sprung could not be tolerated, if it had its roots in this country. For instance, polygamy cannot be suffered to exist in this country; but can we deny to the sons of a Mohammedan, who has lived after the law of his own country in polygamy, the right of property in a thing belonging to the father's succession which happens to be on our territory? Certainly not.⁵ Polygamy is in this case only the remote foundation of a claim, which in other respects does not come into conflict with our legal system; it is a condition precedent to the process for asserting that claim. Polygamy exists, and did exist in these foreigners' country, and the decisions of our judges cannot touch it. But if our system of law refused to recognise legal relations of the kind, which are illegal in this country, even as facts or conditions precedent to other legal claims, the final result of this view would simply be to throw intercourse with the foreign country in question into complete confusion, and in truth to do away with any settled intercourse. In view of slavery in particular, Story, § 96, ad fin. says: "In an important case in America, it was held that civil incapacities and disqualifications, by which a person is affected under the law of his domicile, should be held valid in other countries so far as applicable to acts done, or rights acquired in the place of his domicile, but not as to acts done or rights acquired within another jurisdiction where no such disqualifications exist." But it is certain, and this seems to be the true test, that our legal system and our courts cannot lend themselves to the direct realisation of legal relations or claims, which would be rejected by our law as absolutely untenable. Thus a slave who has been brought into this country, or has escaped into it, cannot be claimed here; a woman, who has escaped from the harem of a Mussulman, cannot be constrained by our courts to continue her polygamous marriage;⁶ the betrothal of a Mussulman, who is living in polygamy, to a second or third wife will not be allowed to take place in this country; and an action founded on some unlawful game, for instance, will be absolutely rejected by the tribunals of this country. So far as the principle has been formulated up to this time, i.e. has found expression in positive enactment, it has not been remembered that to recognise a law as a fact, and to assist it directly in extending its operations by carrying it out to practical conclusions, are two different things. The new draft of the Belgian Code (see below, note 8) is the best expression of these considerations that we have, while the conception of the Oxford resolutions of the Institute of International Law is far less complete. If the question is guarded in this way, the determination of the particular cases which it would be impracticable to enumerate à priori may be left to judicial discretion. In our view, we are not concerned with any fundamental principle of private international law, but only with the decision of a few exceptional cases, which are of rare occurrence among nations which stand upon approximately equal stages of civilisation.⁷

⁵ On this point, see the agreement between Lomonaco, p. 60, and Laurent, 4, § 293.

Laurent (viii. §§ 95-121) has, with particular regard to the law of obligations, undertaken a very searching enquiry, with the object of accurately characterising those rules of law, on which the present question turns. But this attempt, too, is unsuccessful. The formula "laws, which have reference to the rights of society" (lois relatives aux droits de la société), is no more distinct than the formula "laws which concern Ordre Public;" and for the most part the other particular rules which he adds as elaborations of the principal proposition are just as vague.⁸

⁷ Savigny, p. 37, § 349, Guthrie, p. 80 (but see also Unger, § 22 ad fin.) asserts besides that there is no room for the application of foreign rules of law, if the whole legal institution to which they refer is unknown to our law, as e.g. slavery, or the so-called civil death, which is imposed as a punishment. But, apart from the consideration that, in the cases immediately in Savigny's view, the application of the foreign rule of law, or more properly its realisation, is inadmissible on the grounds already considered, it is to be remembered that legal institutions of different countries which go by the same names are yet, in so far as their results are concerned, very different from each other. Are they then identical, or are they distinct legal institutions? If we decide in favour of the former alternative, we regard, in the scholastic style of Bartolus, the name as the determinant; if in favour of the latter, we may exclude, in a most arbitrary way, the application of any foreign rules of law we like (see above, § 29). Savigny himself supplies an eloquent example of this arbitrary procedure. He thinks (cf. p. 196 et seq. § 368, Guthrie, p. 191), and rightly thinks, that it is inadmissible that a right of pledge in a moveable thing, founded on the common law of Rome in country A, should be successfully pleaded against a possessor of that thing in country B, where rights of pledge in moveables can only be enforced against third persons in possession, if they have been previously completed by delivery. Instead, however, of settling this determination on the ground that the right of the possessor, which took its rise in country B, is superior to the right constituted by the pledge, he says that a right of pledge founded on a mere contract is a different legal institution from one founded on delivery. But in that way a right of property, founded according to the law of France upon a simple bargain, would not be capable of being pleaded within a territory ruled by the common law of Rome, because tradition is necessary there.

If it were necessary, in framing some code, to lay down rules for the application of foreign law, we could not, it is certain, dispense with some proposition which should express the protection to be given to the laws of our own country against those of foreign countries, which rest upon moral or social theories which differ violently from our own. It is by no means easy to hit upon the exact language which would be proper to such a proposition. Fortunately, we should only have to have recourse comparatively seldom to such a clause of exception, which would serve as a safety-valve: that is, if our other principles were correctly formulated. Perhaps we might put it thus: "The application of foreign rules of law is excluded in so far as it would serve to bring into operation in the territory of our State legal relations which cannot be permitted according to our legal system, or to compel the performance of acts and services which, in accordance with our legal system, should not be compelled."

APPLICATION OF FOREIGN LAW ON THE MOTION OF PARTIES ONLY OR ex officio. PROOF OF FOREIGN LAW. IS THE OMISSION TO APPLY A RULE OF FOREIGN LAW, OR THE ERRONEOUS APPLICATION OF IT, ACCOMPANIED BY THE SAME RESULTS AS EMERGE IF A RULE OF OUR OWN LAW IS LEFT OUT OF CONSIDERATION OR ERRONEOUSLY APPLIED?¹ TREATIES, IN SO FAR AS THEY TOUCH ON PRIVATE LEGAL RELATIONS.

§ 37. According to the strict view that once prevailed,² foreign law is simply, as far as the judge is concerned, a fact, and in any suit must

(1.) Aux lois qui dependent du droit public (?) et du droit pénal.

(2.) Aux lois qui concernent les bonnes mœurs.

(3.) Aux lois qui abolissent les privilèges politiques en matière de succession."

We may remark, in passing, that it seems to us that it is too much to ask (§ 108, p. 169) that a rule of law shall only be looked upon as in conflict with boni mores, if the views of all civilised nations agree in taking this view. If, in State A, X cannot marry V because they are related by blood or marriage to each other in a particular way, it is irrelevant in such a matter that there is some other State, with other laws, which allows such a marriage. The more recent draft of a civil code for Belgium, which was worked out by a commission appointed in 1884 (see Revue, xviii. p. 442), contains in its 14th article this simple idea, which in my opinion is also more correct, viz.: "non obstant les articles qui précédent, il ne peut être pris égard aux lois étrangères dans les cas où leur application aurait pour résultat de porter atteinte aux lois du royaume qui consacrent ou garantissent un droit ou un intérêt social."

² Oppenheim, Völkerr. p. 381. Langenbeck, Archiv. für die civilistische Praxis, vol. 41, 1858, p. 132. Judgment of the Supreme Court of App. at Lübeck, of 10th December 1835 be treated as such: the judge, therefore, does not seem to be entitled to apply a foreign rule of law unless the parties expressly direct his notice to it. It may be that, as a matter of history, this theory is connected with those legal doctrines to which appeal was frequently made towards the end of the Middle Ages, and especially at the time of the reception of the Roman law by learned jurists and Universities.

A second theory, but one that has a limited currency, regards the judge as plainly entitled to apply foreign law, but not bound to do so.³

According to a third and last theory, the application of foreign law, wherever there is an indication of such a thing, becomes pars judicis. This third view, which in modern times is adopted more and more widely,⁴ and with which it will at present be found possible to a certain extent to reconcile the demand that the parties shall furnish proof of the foreign law, is correct. Its foundation is that the judge is called upon to respect foreign rules of law by virtue of an express or implied direction of his own law, which commits the decision of the concrete case in question to the foreign law. The opposite view leaves it to the good pleasure of the parties to say what rules of law are to be applied, and forces the judge to decide in certain circumstances on the strangest principles,⁵ because the foreign law is viewed simply as a fact, and can only be understood according to the statements of parties in the process;

(Seuffert, 8, No. 85). The rule "Locus regit actum," according to this judgment, must be pleaded as an objection on behalf of the defender, if the law of the place where the bargain was made differs from that of the court. Accordingly, the Supreme Court of App. at Lübeck, on 14th September 1850, also held that a plea upon this rule could not be introduced in the court of appeal (Römer, ii. p. 400). Judgment of the Supreme Court at Berlin on 19th May 1857 (Striethorst, 26, p. 49) runs to this effect: "It seems, too, that in regard to transactions, which are to be judged by foreign law, in the first place the existence of the statute or the law must, if it is questioned, be proved as a fact" (Draft of a commercial code for Würtemberg, Art. 997). A judgment of the Supreme Court of App. at Darmstadt, 12th October 1850, runs thus: "The simple averment, that the bargain was invalid according to the law of the foreign place where it was concluded, is not to be held sufficient" (Seuffert, 9, No. 210).

³ Kört. Erörterungen, iii. p. 29.

⁴ Wächter, i. p. 310. A more recent judgment of the Supreme Court of App. at Lübeck, of 13th January 1857, recognises, in contradiction of the earlier decisions of the same court already cited, that the judge may at once apply foreign law which is known to him. The practice of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Cassel (Strippelman, i. p. 57) followed the same principle. Among the adherents of this theory are to be counted all those who, like Savigny (i. p. 191), Mittermaier (Archiv. für die civil. prax. xviii. p. 67), Seuffert, Comm. i. p. 235, and Unger (i. p. 306, note 40), look upon foreign law as being on the analogy of a customary law in this respect. Laurent, too, declares himself quite distinctly for this view (ii. §. 262). Especially valuable as an illustration is a decision of the old Imperial Commercial Trib. of 9th November 1872 (Dec. viii. p. 12). It is explained, in that case, that a pursuer is not barred from complaining in the Court of Appeal that by mistake native law had been applied instead of foreign law, although in the lower courts he had himself pleaded for the application of native law; for the application of foreign law follows as pars judicis. For an instance of its application ex parte judicis, see a judgment of the same court, of 26th April 1879 (Dec. xxiv. p. 51).

⁵ See, on the other hand, Kritz, Rechtsfälle, ii. p. 95, Schäffner, p. 208.

the intermediate view, which commits the matter to the good pleasure of the judge, is at variance with the nature of the judicial office.⁶

Nor is it any good objection to our view that the party who does not in a suit appeal to foreign law, impliedly thereby submits himself to the native law. Because, as a judgment of the Supreme Court⁷ notices, we must suppose that the party who is worsted according to the course of the native law has omitted to appeal to foreign law from no other reason than forgetfulness.

From the practical point of view, objection has been taken to our theory, that it must often involve the judge in unprofitable difficulties,⁸ and that you cannot require from him a knowledge of foreign law. The latter objection is right to this extent, that as a general rule neglect of duty cannot be imputed to a judge, who, where neither party having appeals to foreign law, omits to apply it.⁹ But the former argument really proves nothing at all; very many rules of law, which serve solely for the protection of some legal principles beyond themselves, lead in many cases into minutiae which are of no use, but yet these rules must be observed.

But this much may be conceded: if the conclusions of the parties are well founded in native law, and if the judge has no special knowledge that any of the conclusions is, according to foreign law, which in strictness must be the foundation of the decision, unfounded, he may proceed in his judgment on the footing that the foreign law on the point in question is at one with his own law, and the question whether foreign law must be applied, and, if so, what foreign law, may be disregarded in the judgment as immaterial.¹⁰ This follows from the fact that a great number of rules of law contain provisions that are in correspondence with the nature of the subject with which they deal,¹¹ and that therefore

¹¹ See this reasoning in the judgment of the Supreme Comm. Court, 26th March 1878 (Seuffert, there is a great number of rules of law in the divergent legal systems of civilised peoples of the same stage of culture that entirely agree with each other: the judge may, therefore, with good reason assume the existence of this agreement, if the contentions of parties, according to the facts which they assert, are in conformity with the native law of the tribunal, and at the same time there has been no appeal to foreign law. If this assumption were not made, the simplest rules of law, which are indispensable in the legal system of any civilised State, would require to be remitted to proof.¹² The presumption, however, will have no application in cases where the native rule of law which comes up for consideration must plainly be recognised as a particular rule of law only.¹³

It follows, too, from the principle of the application of foreign law by the judge as part of his duty, that a party may, at any stage of the case, appeal to a foreign rule of law that is to his advantage.¹⁴ But a true exception (exceptio) raised by the applicability of the foreign rule of law must, as in other cases, be pleaded, and it may be a good ground for repelling a plea of nullity urged against the judgment of a lower court, if the party in that lower court has omitted to appeal to the foreign rule of law, and if, therefore, there is no ground for asserting that there is any legal mistake or oversight in the judgment brought up on appeal.¹⁵

NOTE B ON § 37. APPLICATION OF FOREIGN LAW.

[In cases in which it is necessary in the course of an action in the English or Scots Courts to ascertain what is the law of any foreign country, England and Scotland being for this purpose considered as foreign one to another, parties now commonly resort to the provisions of the statutes 22 and 23 Vict. c. 63, and 24 Vict. c. 11. The former Act applies to cases where Scottish courts desire information as to English law, or vice versa, the latter to cases where courts in the United Kingdom desire to be informed as to foreign law. The provisions in both cases are, that where it shall be the opinion of any court that it is necessary or expedient for the proper disposal of any action to ascertain what is the law applicable to the facts of the case, as administered abroad, or in any part of Her Majesty's dominions, other than that where the court is situated, the court may 34, No. 172). The judge, too, may require an exposition of the foreign law sufficient to guide him in its application. So Goldschmidt, Handelsr. p. 38, note 18, and the judgments of the old German Supreme Comm. Court there cited; in particular, a judgment of 24th April 1874 (Dec. 8, p. 208).

direct a case to be prepared and laid before one of the supreme courts in the other part of the queen's dominions, or in the foreign country whose law is to be ascertained, in order that that court may give an opinion upon it. The court is to apply the opinion of any other court in the queen's dominions when obtained, but in the case of a foreign court may re-remit the case for further consideration, or may make a fresh remit to any other superior court of the same country before proceeding to apply it; the explanation of the difference is, that power is given to consulted courts within Her Majesty's dominions to take for themselves, before returning their opinion, such further procedure as they may think fit. No such power can, of course, be conferred by the British statute upon foreign courts.

In spite of these enactments, it is still competent to ascertain the foreign law, either by the examination of foreign lawyer as witnesses (Parnell v. Walter, 1889. Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xvi. 917. Ross, Oct. 29, 1891. Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xix.), or by a judicial remit to a foreign legal authority, e.g. a professor of law (Goetz v. Aders. 1874. Ct. of Session Reps. 4th ser. ii. 150). Where both parties concur in a judicial remit, they are bound by its result (Welsh v. Milne, 1844. Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd series, vii. 213).

The practice of the English courts is stated in the passages in Mr Westlake's work referred to in the author's notes. The English and Scottish courts, however, adhere to the view that foreign law is a fact to be averred and proved like any other fact. No amount of familiarity with the legal system to which reference is made will entitle a judge to decide how the law of another country, be that other country no more remote than Scotland or England, as the case may be, stands, if there is any dispute on the question between the parties. Even the fact of the Scottish judge e.g. being a member of the English bar, will not entitle him to decide a question of English law, without some such procedure as is narrated above. If the evidence of the witnesses adduced is insufficient or contradictory, the court may investigate the law for themselves either in the light of foreign decisions, or the opinions of foreign writers, or even by examining for themselves the text of the law (Concha v. Murrietta, 15th Feb. 1889. L. R. 40, Ch. Div. 543, and Bremer v. Freeman, ib. cit.). There may, of course, be cases in which the law is so familiar to all that it will be assumed, just as in the region of facts judges and jurists may assume, and must assume, without proof facts that are in the common knowledge of all. The judges of a Scottish court may construe an English will, if there is no technicality of English law involved, all that is necessary being to follow the ordinary rules of grammar and logic (Thomson's Trs. v. Alexander, 1851. Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xiv. p. 217). That being so, it would seem impossible to hold with the author that it is pars judicis to apply foreign law. Unless parties appeal to it, he must, it is thought, determine the case by the only law of which he has any knowledge, viz. that of his own country; and even although he may be of opinion that the one party or the other should have appealed to foreign law, he cannot avoid deciding the case by his own law, any more than he would, in deciding a case on evidence, be entitled to import into his opinion some fact which he had happened to witness, or some piece of scientific knowledge which he chanced to possess. It is not meant that the court may not throw out suggestions to the parties that this or that foreign law should be pleaded: such suggestions are matters of common occurrence. But if neither party is prepared to plead foreign law, it is thought that the court can neither refuse to adjudicate, nor at its own hand introduce the doctrine of a foreign law as the ratio of its judgment. The House of Lords, however, as the appeal court of the United Kingdom, and versed in the laws of the three kingdoms, in deciding appeal cases will apply its own legal knowledge of the different systems. It will not look at evidence as to English law given to a Scottish court, for example, but decide the case from its own knowledge of English law (Douglas v. Brown, 1831, 2 Dow, and Cl. p. 171, 5 Wilson and Shaw, p. 47. Cooper v. Cooper, 1888. Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th series xv. (H. of L. p. 23).]

§ 38. II. In truth, as Laurent (ii. § 269) correctly remarks, foreign law is no more pure fact for the judge than his own law is.¹⁶ The maxim which rules in native law, viz. "jura novit curia," cannot, of course, be set up as an assumption when foreign law is in question. The proof of the law (in so far as proof is not rendered superfluous by reason of common knowledge¹⁷) which parties furnish is not, as in the case of other facts, an indispensable necessity, but merely an assistance, which is intended to protect the judge from laborious enquiries, and save him time and trouble. Although, therefore, in earlier civil process the proof of foreign law was as matter of solemnity imposed upon the party who appealed to it, and although at the present day it is left to that party to furnish proof of the alleged foreign rule of law,¹⁸ the judge is by no means excluded from an independent investigation for the purpose of establishing the foreign rule of law.¹⁹ He may collect and use, according to his discretion, materials other than

those furnished by the parties, and any limitation of time for leading evidence,²⁰ or restrictions of the mode of proof, applicable in other cases, is not to be strictly applied in this case, any more than in proof as to a law of custom in the country of the court itself, so as to cut short the enquiry. Everything may be used as evidence²¹ which can convince the judge of the validity of the alleged rule of law at the time of the enquiry,²² but no evidence is admitted the weight of which substantially depends on the agreement of parties. Admissions²³ in such matters are not, as in other branches of civil process, regarded as settlements of the questions at issue, but simply as evidence in the same way as in criminal processes,²⁴ and references to oath are excluded. An exception is made in cases in which these references are to be used to prove particular facts, which go to establish a foreign customary law.²⁵ To admit such evidence would be to force the judge in certain circumstances to decide contrary to his conviction, and on rules of law which have no existence.²⁶ The best evidence of the existence of a particular rule of law is undoubtedly the testimony of foreign courts and eminent foreign lawyers,²⁷ since even in the case of laws that have been formally published there may be a divergent practice, or an interpretation of them sanctioned by usage, which the judge, with nothing but the text of the law before him, might never discover; and besides the judge may not have sufficient material at his command to ²⁰ So the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Lübeck, 23rd October 1868 (Seuffert, 25, No. 1). I have in truth said nothing to the contrary in my former edition, § 32, note 13, p. 119; Menger, System des oesterreichischen Civil processes, i. p. 176, 1876, has misunderstood me.

²³ There is no doubt that, when both sides agree, it may at once be assumed that the foreign law which is under consideration has or has not a particular import. Cf. judgment of the Supreme Commercial Court of the Empire on 16th May 1871 and 4th December 1872 (Dec. ii. p. 294, and viii. p. 150), also judgment in the Supreme Court of England of 9th May 1876, reported by Westlake in Revue, x. p. 546 [Meyer v. Ralli, L. R. 1, C.B. Div. 358. Where both parties admit that a foreign tribunal has failed to apply its own law correctly, the English Court will hold that the judgment is not binding].

²⁴ See Schäffner, p. 209, who, however, proposes to allow reference to oath.

²⁵ Mittermaier (Archiv. f. d. civilist. Praxis, xviii. p. 80) as a rule excludes reference to oath, but allows (p. 75) admissions to be taken.

²⁶ Admissions can in any case only be considered in so far as they really convince the judge. The peculiar and absolutely binding force of judicial admissions in civil process is not recognised in such matters. It follows from § 410 of the German Code of Procedure that there can be no reference to oath on the direct question of the existence of a rule of law. Such a reference, however, would be conceivable in the case of acts of the opposite party or his predecessors, in so far as proof of these acts is intended to be used as proof of a law of custom prevailing in a foreign country. See Seuffert, Comm. zur deutschen civilprozessordnung, § 265.

enable him to understand the law.²⁸ But yet, especially when well-known and complete codes are concerned, a decision may be given on their authority directly. The citation of an isolated passage, however, must be regarded as insufficient, without the testimony of a foreign court or counsel to explain its meaning, since the import of a rule of law is substantially affected by its relation to other kindred propositions.^{29 30}

It is, however, often a matter of the greatest difficulty to prove foreign rules of law which come up for consideration,³¹ and it may be said that it is by no means rare for courts to make mistakes on such matters. In the same way it is often very difficult, in concluding important legal transactions, to get with sufficient certainty the necessary information as to the law of the foreign country. It has accordingly been contemplated to set up an international office, to be supported by the governments of eminence must depend on notoriety, or must be properly authenticated, and the opinion must be properly attested: the other party is permitted to adduce an opinion in the opposite sense, to refute the one first obtained. Since the code for the German Empire came into force, this rescript has lost its binding force.

The rule for the German Empire is now the very well conceived § 265 of the Ordinance for civil procedure. "The law in force in another State, customary law and statutes alike, only require to be proved in so far as they are unknown to the court. In ascertaining these rules of law, the court is not confined to the evidence laid before it by the parties; it is entitled to avail itself of other sources of information, and to make such orders as may be necessary for that object."

²⁹ But if it should happen that the same source of legal principle is recognised in the foreign country, as in the lex fori, then a mere difference in procedure is not allowed to come into competition with the views which prevail in the court that is trying the case. The German Supreme Court of Commerce has very rightly assumed this in a judgment of 7th December 1874 (Dec. xv. No. 61).

³⁰ [The rules of practice in English and Scottish courts, as to the interpretation to be placed on foreign codes or enactments, are much the same as those stated in the text, with this qualification, that it would require a very special case to induce the court to undertake for itself the interpretation of them, without evidence. See above, note B. p. 102]. The courts of England and Scotland, and the United States, are not satisfied with the text of the enactments, without special ground for believing that the ruling proposition of law which they desire is therein contained. Foote, pp. 435 et seq., cites cases to show that, according to English practice, unless both sides submit some particular enactment as the only ruling authority, or refer to it in that sense, foreign law can never be proved, except by the evidence of foreigners learned in the law, whose authority then becomes binding on the English judge. The English Legislature has hit upon an expedient in the statutes 22 and 23 Vict. c. 63, and 24 Vict. c. 11, which is peculiar, but may be practically very useful in the case of a great empire with territorial laws which differ widely from each other (see supra, note B. p. 101; Westlake, §§ 359, 360; Foote, p. 439).

different States, which should ascertain with official authority the existence of legal rules, statutes, etc., and communicate them to officials and private persons.³² But the operations of such a general international office would be too difficult, and not sufficiently certain after all.

It is plain that the best information on the law of any foreign State, which may alter very quickly, can be obtained directly from the State itself. The difficulty chiefly lies in this, that one does not know the names of those trustworthy specialists and learned persons, who are at the same time ready to give such opinions as are desired. Mutual communications between governments as to the addresses of such persons might perhaps, if made sufficiently public, serve simply and better the object of giving information as to foreign law. But a non-judicial office could not well lay claim to authority which should be formally binding, even under the limitation that its attestation was only asked to establish authoritatively the formal existence and continuance of some particular paragraph in a statute; for even in such matters a decision on difficult legal problems may be involved. In so far as courts are called upon to give a decision on foreign law, it would be better to proceed by a direct requisition to the foreign court to determine the special questions of the pending process. This is a way to which the English legislature has already had recourse [see note B., p. 101]. But it presupposes a treaty, and cannot as yet be looked upon as a possibility that is within sight of realisation. This method requires a deep mutual confidence in the administration of justice in the different countries concerned, if the court is to be restricted to it, or if it must look upon the answers of the foreign court as formally binding.³³

It would be a convenience to facilitate the settlement of barristers or attorneys of foreign nationality under certain securities, in the great centres of population, where there is a specially lively intercourse with other countries.

In this way the public who were in search of law would be best served, and the courts could indirectly inform themselves by their assistance on points of foreign law. At the same time, governments might certainly supply public libraries better with collections of the statutes of other countries than has hitherto been the case. There is, as yet, far too narrow an exchange between different nations in this matter.

§ 39. III. As regards mistakes in the application of foreign rules of law or the non-application of them, we must make this distinction, viz.:

(a.) Suppose that the court has erroneously assumed that a particular question of law is or is not to be determined by foreign law. In other words, violence has been done to the principles of private international law; in such a case, of course, the conception of the principles in question which has ruled the case is that which the lex fori, the legal system of the judge, entertains. As the principles of private international law are to a certain extent also principles of the native law, the consequences of a violation of those principles must be the same as the consequences which follow upon the violation of other native rules of law. It is, for instance, beyond a doubt that, according to § 511 of the Code of Civil Procedure in the German Empire,³⁴ an appeal in such a case—under the conditions required in all appeals—is competent up to the highest court. The opposite is the case, in some instances, when we turn to the French Court of Cassation, although in France, too, the principles of private international law must be regarded as principles of French law. An appeal to the Court of Cassation requires that some law should have been violated. A violation of a rule of law, which cannot be referred to some definite French enactment, does not found such an appeal. Now, as there are many principles of private international law which have been specially sanctioned by the Code Civil, and also by public treaties which have a legislative force, or must be treated as if they had been so sanctioned, while others are not, it comes to pass that in many questions of private international law, a decision of the highest court in France may be had, while in others its jurisdiction is excluded.³⁵ This distinction has a foundation in history, i.e. in the peculiar origin of the Court of Cassation, but none in reason.³⁶ It comes to this, that, in many of the most difficult questions that can arise, the jurisdiction of the supreme court is excluded, while a want of uniformity may come to prevail in the judgments of the different subordinate courts of appeal. It is, besides, hard to lay down a line between what the written law has enacted and that which, without being so enacted, is still law; for the results or inferences from an enactment are themselves law, and we can only determine what these results or inferences are to be by setting the enactment itself alongside of the whole legal system to which it belongs. In truth, the French Court of Cassation, following the natural result of development, has gone on subjecting to its review the principles of private international law, as these are applied by the French courts, to a greater and greater extent. A similar state of things would result if the legal remedy, such as the old suit at common law on account of what was called a curable nullity, were attached to the violation of a clear rule of law. Only in that case a clear course of practice may take the place of the positive enactment, which, according to the French idea, requires to be violated.

³² Norsa in 1885 made a recommendation of this kind to the Institute of International Law (see report of it in the Annuaire de l'Inst. 8ème année, pp. 235-270). This proposal was not adopted, but in 1885 a more restricted proposal was, which contemplated merely the exchange of the texts of enactments and administrative regulations of special importance, and merely desired a trustworthy collection of these publications in every State accessible to the public (see the resolutions passed at Heidelberg in 1887, Annuaire, ix. pp. 305 et seq.).

³³ The English court does not do so in the case of courts beyond Her Majesty's dominions.

³⁴ Cf. e.g. Seuffert, Comm. on this paragraph; Struckmann and Koch, § 511, note 5.

³⁶ Demangeat expresses himself to this effect ut sup. cit. Fusinato (Introduzione, p. 107) is of a different opinion, excepting the case where the native law contains an express provision.

(b.) Suppose that the court in its decision has done violence to that territorial law, by which it meant to determine the question at issue. The theory, which discovers a fundamental difference between the application of native and of foreign law, and desires to have foreign law treated purely as a matter of fact, must in this case refuse that legal remedy in dispensing which the judge of the superior court is confined to a review of the law of the case appealed to him. French jurisprudence in this case again proceeds according to the principle³⁷ already mentioned (note 35). According to the Code of Civil Procedure for the German Empire, however, all and every kind of review of judgments, in which legal rules which are said to belong to a foreign law and are not recognised in Germany are wrongly assumed, or foreign law is wrongly interpreted, is excluded. But these limitations are unreasonable. They must disappear as the view begins to prevail that the distinction between native and foreign law in such matters is only a practical expedient to assist the judge. There is no practical end, assuredly, attained by withdrawing legal questions involving foreign law from the review of the supreme court; all the less that on the one hand, as a general rule, a knowledge of foreign law is more easily and more naturally to be found there; and as, on the other hand, the uniformity in the administration of justice within the State may suffer by the variety of interpretation that may be put upon foreign law within the various minor jurisdictions.³⁸ Pierantoni³⁹ and Gianzana (ii. § 45), and a German practitioner also,⁴⁰ have pronounced for the competency of the supreme courts in questions of foreign laws as in other questions.⁴¹

³⁷ The supreme court has held cassation to be admissible if a mistaken application of the foreign law has resulted indirectly in a mistaken application of French law, or in its non-application. Cf. Brocher, i. pp. 154, 155. Fusinato, Introduzione, pp. 107, 108, proposes to make no difference between native and foreign law. The latter is positive law as much as the former.

³⁸ Cf. the paper by Fels, cited in note 40. If, for example, according to § 662 of the Code of Civil Procedure in the German Empire, civil judgments of foreign courts are only to be executed on security for reciprocity, the different courts of Germany might be of different opinions on the nature of reciprocity; and so, judgments of the same foreign State might be carried out in one district while in another they were rejected.

³⁹ In his paper, cited more than once, p. 19, Italian practice seems still to follow the opposite course. Cf. Gianzana, ii. No. 44.

⁴⁰ Fels, Revisionsrecht und Sonderrecht, ein Beitrag zur Lehre von der Revision in bürgerlichen Rechtsstreitigkeiten, 1884.

§ 40. IV. Provisions contained in treaties which have a direct bearing on private international law, or indirectly rule its questions, are to be treated by the courts like statutory enactments. A treaty as such does not bind a court, but only in so far as it is published as a positive law or as a regulation that is to take the place of positive law.⁴² Accordingly, courts interpret⁴³ the provisions of treaties according to their own convictions, just as in the case of positive enactments,⁴⁴ and the views which may have been expressed by a government or diplomatists have no force to bind the courts; they may claim a certain authority on matters of fact, but that is all, unless they have been published along with the principal treaty in the proper form. From this it follows that the court must test the validity of treaties which have been published, or of some of their provisions, as the case may be, just as they do in the case of enactments or regulations of the ordinary kind.⁴⁵ It also follows that contradictions between State treaties and other provisions of the law are to be treated just like other antinomies.⁴⁶ Thus, so far as the decisions of the courts are concerned, a more recent statute takes precedence of an antecedent treaty,⁴⁷ although the State which publishes a statute, doing violence to a treaty which is still in force, ⁴² So, too, Ernst v. Meier, "Ueber den Abschluss von Staatsverträgen," 1874, esp. pp. 115 and 112; Laband, "Das Staatsrecht des deutschen Reichs," ii. p. 156, 2nd ed. i. § 62; H. Schulze, "Lehrbuch des deutschen Staatsrechts," ii. p. 326; Alderson Foote, Jour. ix. p. 478.

⁴³ On the interpretation of public treaties with reference to questions of private international law, the clever expositions of Durand (p. 509) are worth attention. It is particularly to be noticed that in treaties which deal with private international law you generally find that there are certain leading principles, which appear to be all of the same validity, but that some of these are subsequently, in exceptional cases, deliberately departed from. Thus the "most highly favoured nation" clause, which now so frequently comes under view, is important. If certain rights are withheld from the subjects of a State which has stipulated for this clause, we may conclude from that, that these rights have never yet been given to any one, in spite of provisions of an earlier treaty with another State which may seem to import the privilege.

⁴⁵ Cf. Norsa, Rev. vi. pp. 256 et seq., and the decisions of the Italian courts there cited.

⁴⁶ So, too, Norsa, ut cit. p. 258.

is not thereby relieved of its obligation as a matter of public law,⁴⁸ and in a case of doubt a law is to be interpreted so that the provisions of a treaty which has been concluded at an earlier date shall be preserved intact. So, for instance, even the treaties which individual States of the German Union have concluded one with another, or with some foreign country, are no longer binding on the court in so far as they are at variance with laws of the German Empire, unless their continued validity is reserved in some way in these laws. On the other hand, courts of law determine nothing but the particular question of private or criminal international law before them, at least in the view of State rights that prevails in France and Germany. A decision on the meaning of the provisions of public treaties which shall directly bind the administrative officials is not within the competence of those courts.⁴⁹

power. It must be distinctly shown, however, that there is really a contradiction. But no such contradiction is held to exist, at least in cases of doubt, if an antecedent treaty with some particular State has stipulated for a more thorough deference being paid to the legislation of that State than is provided by a general supervening enactment (Norsa, Rev. ix. pp. 235, 236, and the judgments of the Italian Courts cited there). Torres Campos (pp. 35-37) describes it as the prevailing doctrine in Spain, that treaties rank before legislative enactments.

⁴⁹ E.g. on the question whether a consul has particular rights under a consular treaty. See decision of the French Court of Cassation, 30th June 1884 (Jour. xii. pp. 307 et seq.), and decisions of the same court 27th July 1877, v. 166; and again, the Tribunal des conflits, 30th June 1877, v. p. 266.

DOMICILE AND NATIONALITY.

INTRODUCTION.

VARIOUS RELATIONS WHICH A PERSON MAY BEAR TO A TERRITORY.

§ 41. Three grounds on which a person may be subjected to the law of any particular State are conceivable. These are actual residence, residence taken up with an intention that it shall be permanent, and, lastly, another kind of connection with the country, which has also a tract of time in view, a connection which originally may very well have depended in every case upon ties of race, but subsequently could be established by means of other facts, e.g. birth in the territory. This connection we call nationality (Staatsangehörigkeit, nationalité, allegiance). Let us note at once that we have here no concern with nationality in the ethnological sense of the term. A nation in that sense, by which we understand a body of human beings held together by means of certain common characteristics,¹ and a common civilisation, has as such no law of its own. International law only recognises the existence of true legal communities, or constituted States;² it does not recognise communities which may some day become legal communities, or in times past were so, or may again become so.

It is obvious that certain extra-territorial effects must attend domicile and nationality;³ were this not the case, the tie between the State and

³ Notwithstanding the importance of allegiance or nationality, and notwithstanding all the exertions of the more modern developments of public law, to give each individual a certain nationality, Stoerk's assertion in Holtzendorff's Handbuch, 2 § 114 (p. 589), is an exaggeration, which is disproved by history: he says, "nationality constitutes the portal which the individual must reach, before he can emerge into the light of recognition by public law." According to him, men whose allegiance or nationality could not be established, would have no legal existence in the regard of public law. A more searching confutation of his theory can only take place in a discussion on public law, not here.

the persons who belong to it would be undone so soon as its territorial limits were passed, and the composition of the State, so far as its subjects were concerned, would depend at any moment on accident. The State would necessarily make use of a resource which it is scarcely possible to put into practice, viz. a hermetical seclusion of itself from all other States. We may, no doubt, for a time leave it undetermined whether the effects of domicile and nationality are exactly co-extensive with the region of proper private law. Even if this were not the case, we might still be sure that a permanent connection with a particular country, whether that be rested on domicile or on some other fact or legal act of the person, must be attended by some other important effects for the individual, which belong to the domain of law. Apart from actual presence in the territory, there exists a certain attachment, and in connection with it a certain loyalty of the individual to the State, and of the State to the individual. The State must protect the individual who belongs to it even in a foreign country, but at the same time may prefer certain claims against him, e.g. the claim for service in her defence; while other States, for the sake of reciprocity, will refrain from making claims upon the foreigner, which are absolutely irreconcilable with the demands of his own country, e.g. they will not require of him service in their defence. On the other hand, however, every State will guarantee certain privileges to those who have a permanent connection with her, at least in the domain of public law, in so far as we can speak of the political rights of individuals. The State will not give strangers, persons who are only temporarily present in her territory, an influence upon the political destinies of the country. If, then, as a preliminary, we turn away altogether from private law in its proper sense, there are numerous other effects of a permanent connection with any particular State left, which show that a more careful investigation of the essence or nature of nationality and its conditions is indispensable.

I. DOMICILE (PLACE OF ABODE. Wohnsitz).

CONDITIONS OF DOMICILE IN GENERAL.

§ 42. The Roman law has substantially become the rule for the determination of the law of domicile¹ all the world over, just for the reason that the views of Roman law on this point correspond completely with the nature of the subject. But there is no doubt that, however simple the definition of domicile seems to be, it is yet often difficult to decide whether the conditions of a real domicile are present in any particular case. The result of a more exact enquiry may be that the practice in England and the United States, although it starts from the same basis as is assumed by the jurisprudence of the continent of Europe, not unfrequently reaches different conclusions. In particular, it is less inclined to allow a change of domicile.

"That place is to be regarded as a man's domicile which he has freely chosen for his permanent abode, and thus for the centre at once of his legal relations and his business."² "Et in eodem loco singulos habere domicilium non ambigitur ubi quis larem ac fortunarum summam constituit, unde rursus non sit discessurus, si nihil avocet, unde quum profectus est, peregrinare videtur, quo si rediit, peregrinare jam desiit."³

There are thus two things⁴ which go to establish a man's domicile, viz.:

First, the intention to choose a place for a permanent abode, and thus to make it the centre of his relations. Thus an abode which is looked upon as merely temporary is not sufficient to found a domicile, although the actual residence may be from time to time prolonged.

Second, the realisation of this intention by acts that correspond with it, e.g. taking a house. The actual length of residence matters not, neither do interruptions of it by absences from time to time.⁵

EVIDENCE OF INTENTION. DOUBTFUL CASES. LOSS OF THE OLD, AND ACQUISITION OF A NEW DOMICILE.

§ 43. As, however, the intention is not, as a rule, expressly announced,⁶ and as even an express declaration, which does not correspond with the facts, will, according to the true theory, be regarded as meaningless,⁷ the

⁴ L. 20, D. ad municipalem, 50, 1 (Paulus), "Domicilium re et facto transfertur, non nuda contestatione."

⁶ Cf. Supreme Court of Appeal at Lübeck, 18th Oct. 1859 (Seuffert, 14, No. 65). According to § 104 of the Code Civil, it must be declared at the municipality either of the old or of the new domicile. Dicey, too, § 78, notes that the chief difficulty lies in judging of the intention.

⁷ See Dicey, p. 85. Thus in England an express declaration by a testator that he desired to retain his domicile in England, although he had in fact transported it to Hamburg, was intention is in many cases a matter of extreme doubt. Is it what is in the person's own mind that is to decide, or is it what would correspond to a reasonable view of his acts?

Westlake, p. 304, very accurately remarks on this point: "According to that doctrine," i.e. the doctrine of Moorhouse v. Lord, 1863, 10, H. of L. p. 272, "a domicile of choice, even in a Christian country, is not acquired by any residence, however preponderant and however permanent, unless the person in question has the intention of subjecting himself and his moveable succession to the law of that country, or, at least, if he does not think expressly of the law, the intention of so incorporating himself with the population of that country that the application of its law to him and to his moveable succession must be considered to be in accordance with his feelings." These remarks of this careful English jurist disclose to us that it is by no means a matter of indifference for the acquisition of a domicile, or—a point which as a general rule will be ruled by the same considerations—for the change of one, what the consequences are which are looked upon as connected with the acquisition or change.⁸ At least, these consequences must count for a good deal, if any consideration is to be given to what the individual thought and intended. This is in fact the explanation of the divergence of the English and American jurisprudence from that of the Continent of Europe, which we have already mentioned. The latter often considers merely the question of the establishment of a general jurisdiction over the person when a question of a change of domicile has to be dealt with. [The former, at least in Mr Westlake's view, requires something more than an intention of unlimited residence, viz. an intention to submit his personal law to the law of the place of that residence.]

But in German practice, too, there has been no lack of doubts in questions as to the place of domicile. In the first place, it is certainly not necessary that one should have a complete intention of remaining for ever at the residence which has been chosen. An intention to stay there indefinitely, so long as no external inducement to change it befalls (Si nihil avocet), is sufficient.⁹ It is this indefiniteness, in that which need only exist in the mind of the person concerned, that so easily makes the very existence of the intention a matter of doubt.¹⁰ One is in this way forced to have recourse to indications of different sorts, which admit of very held to be inept [in re Steer, 1858, H. & N. 594, 28 L. J. (Ex.) 22]. To the same effect, Foote, p. 14.

⁸ [The courts of Scotland have held that it is no bar to the acquisition of a domicile which will give jurisdiction to divorce, that the pursuer of that action distinctly avows that it was for that purpose that he came to Scotland. Carswell v. Carswell, 1881, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. viii. 901. Stavert v. Stavert, 1882, do. do. 519. See the remarks of Lord Young in *Low v. ⁹ See the decision of the court at Lübeck, in Seuffert, 14, No. 65. Dicey says, very truly, that the best definition of intention that can be given seems to be the negative one, viz. the absence of any present intention not to stay at the place in question.

various interpretations. Thus, for instance, the transference of a merchant's business to another place is not held to be enough to infer a change of domicile; even although the merchant, who is a married man, betakes himself with his business to that place. It has very properly been the custom to enquire in such cases whether his family went with him to his new place of residence, or stayed at the old one:¹¹ and at the same time the fact that the family have stayed behind may seem of no importance, because there may for instance have been cause for that in temporary matrimonial disagreements, or some other matter of that kind.^{12 13} One is also obliged to set store upon the purchase of a house, the payment of personal municipal dues, the acquisition of a special local franchise—unless this is a mere formality to facilitate the acquisition of landed estate.

Domicile once established, however, only ceases when both of its necessary conditions cease to exist. It continues if the intention alone remains, while actual residence has ceased, and it continues also in the same way, if there is merely an intention formed to change the domicile.¹⁴ But it also ceases if the domicile is quitted, while no intention of returning to it subsists. An intention to acquire a domicile in some other place is not requisite. A man may wish to live as a traveller or a vagabond.

LEGAL DOMICILE. FORCED RESIDENCE. FORCED ABSENCE.

§ 44. Intention to establish a domicile in a particular place may find an equivalent in compulsion, or in the direct provision of the law. According to Roman law, persons who were banished to a particular place had their domicile there.¹⁵ The common law practice in Germany has often extended this rule incorrectly to the case of persons who are detained in gaols.¹⁶ On the other hand, where persons are transported for life to a ¹¹ For different views on the question whether the tenant of a farm retains his domicile at the place where he has hitherto resided, or whether it passes over to the place where his farm is situated, see the judgments given by Seuffert, 11, No. 103. On the case of servants, see the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Lübeck, of 19th April 1845, Seuffert, 4, No. 254.

¹² See the judgment of the court at Lübeck, cited in note 10.

¹⁴ Cf. Dicey, p. 44; Wharton, § 56. Dicey gives this clear and correct definition, viz.: A person's domicile is that place or country either (1) in which he, in fact, resides with the intention of residence (animus manendi); or (2) in which, having so resided, he continues actually to reside although no longer retaining the intention of residence (animus manendi); or (3) with regard to which, having so resided there, he retains the intention of residence (animus manendi) though he in fact no longer resides there.

Even formal declarations before some authority of an intention to change a domicile will not work that change, unless an actual change of residence follows. Decision of the Imperial Tribunal of Commerce, 22nd May 1874. Dec. 13, p. 363, reported in the Journal, ii. p. 369. There are some French decisions to the same effect cited there.

penal settlement, in which prisoners can set themselves up with a house and a business, the English practice holds correctly that there is a change of domicile.^{17 18}

The case of persons who are banished from their native country for political reasons seems particularly doubtful. It is plain that they do not at once acquire a domicile in the place where they live, although it may be that they live there for a considerable time. In the same way, it is just as plain that, if, as matter of fact, they enter on a course of life in another place, which indubitably requires an animus remanendi, they do set up a domicile for themselves there, and that thereafter there is no need to enquire what the cause for their originally leaving their homes was. But we must at the same time say that we cannot associate with a case of such enforced absence a continued intention to retain the former place of residence as the centre of the citizen's life and action. One cannot set up with any sort of certainty the indefinite hope, that the sentence of banishment may one day be removed, and there is therefore no juristic ground for presuming any such prospect or intention of return. Although the English decisions¹⁹ are based on this hope of return, that again proceeds on the consideration that the question with which they are concerned is the determination of the personal law of the exiles. They have not acquired a new domicile, and if the persistence of the old domicile be denied, there would be no so-called personal statute to apply to them at all. This, too, shows us that the question as to what effects are to be attached by the law to the domicile, is not without a bearing on the question as to the existence of that domicile. There is certainly a clear distinction to be taken between a true exile and the fear of an emigrant that hardships may befall him if he stays in his own country. The monstrous threats of punishment which at the time of the first French Revolution were uttered against the emigrants turned what was at first a voluntary emigration into a true exile.

LEGAL DOMICILE OF OFFICIALS, SOLDIERS, AND PERSONS IN A DEPENDENT POSITION IN A FAMILY.

§ 45. The law of Rome assigned a domicile of necessity, besides that of exiles, to the public official at the seat of his service, and to the soldier at the place of his garrison, and made persons in certain dependent positions in a family follow the domicile of its head, so that in those cases there

No. 358. Wharton, § 54, holds that in cases of imprisonment for life a change of domicile takes place.

¹⁷ Phillimore, 191; Dicey, 129.

¹⁸ The result is different if, as in the case of prisoners in a gaol, there is no free activity as of a citizen, and, for instance, no setting up of a home. Detention in a lunatic asylum, therefore, will never set up a domicile there for the lunatic. See judgment of the Appeal Court at Darmstadt, on 6th Dec. 1852, Seuffert, 10, No. 12. It is another question whether the curator of a person of unsound mind can change his ward's domicile. On that question, see below.

could be no question either as to the true place of residence, or as to the intention of the person.²⁰ No international importance can, however, be allowed to the former grounds of jurisdiction. If we were to recognise them in any cases beyond those²¹ in which a domicile would be set up at the place in question in any event, i.e. on general principles, we should allow the condition of a soldier or an official an extra-territorial operation, which would, putting aside the cases of extra-territoriality which public law recognises, be contradictory of the principles of public law. The fictitious domicile set up, by § 16 of the German Code of Procedure, for officials of the German Empire, or of one of her States established in a foreign country, has a direct recognition in the view of public law only in the case of those officials who can claim rights of extra-territoriality, and only to the extent to which that privilege of extra-territoriality goes. But there is no doubt that the office which the official fills in the foreign country may be one that is at variance with the supposition that he will hold it for an indefinite period. Thus in English practice it is held that the acceptance of an ambassadorial or consular post in a particular place will never found a domicile there, but that plainly by accepting such a post the domicile already established at that place will not be dissolved (cf. Dicey, pp. 137 et seq.). [Udny v. Udny, 1869. Ct. of Sess. Reps. 3rd series, vii. (H. of L.), p. 89. The case of a person holding consular position in Italy for forty years, but not thereby losing his Scots domicile.]

On the other hand, those necessary domiciles which rest upon the natural dependence of some members of a family have a claim for international recognition.

Thus the wife shares the husband's domicile, even although he shifts it after marriage.²² An actual separation, although it subsists with the consent of the husband, cannot according to English decisions²³ enable the wife to acquire an independent domicile. The result will be different if ²⁰ No doubt we must assume that the soldier or official had entered upon service at the place of the garrison or of the employment, or had gone there for that purpose. A pure fiction is not intended. Cf. L. 23, § 1, D. 50, 1, in relation to the soldier, ubi meret; Wach (Handbuch des deutschen Civil processes, 1, 1885, p. 404), who assumes in such cases a real but a forced jurisdiction.

there be a permanent judicial separation of the spouses, although no decree of divorce has been pronounced.²⁴ If in the circumstances of any particular case we shall negative the duty of the wife, which, as a general rule,²⁵ must be affirmed, to follow her husband to another domicile, we must then necessarily hold that the former domicile continues to subsist for her.²⁶

In the same way, a child under age and in patria potestate follows the father's domicile.²⁷ The domicile of bastards is the domicile which the mother had at the date of their birth. The question whether the child, in the case of a subsequent change of domicile by the mother, necessarily follows her domicile, must depend upon the question whether the mother can have ascribed to her a right which shall be equivalent to the patria potestas.²⁸ By the common law of Rome, this question must be answered in the negative; the bastard child is under curatory; this question at once arises, Can the curator—and under what conditions—change his ward's domicile? ²⁹

²⁵ This duty ceases, if the husband is not in a position to offer her a house and maintenance in his new domicile. Cf. Supreme Court of Appeal, Wiesbaden, 15th February 1837; Oldenburg, 1857 (Seuffert, i. No. 237, 18, No. 257); Supreme Court of Appeal, Darmstadt, 1867 (Seuffert, 21, No. 129). We may also negative the duty, under certain circumstances, if the husband emigrates to distant countries with a widely different civilisation. Cf. judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Dresden, 24th October 1850 (Seuffert, 4, No. 126).

²⁶ See, too, the German Code of Civil Procedure, § 568, subdiv. 2: "A suit" (for divorce, etc.) "may be brought by a wife in the Court of the husband's last domicile in the German Empire, when he has deserted her, and has no domicile save abroad." Cf. the decisions of the English Courts to the same effect cited by Phillimore, § 88. Phillimore himself remarks that the rule that the domicile is that of the husband must not be stretched so far as to create an injustice, e.g. to make it impossible for the wife to appeal to a court which can give effect to her claim. [But it has been held in Scotland that, in a case where a wife has been deserted by her husband, she cannot, by returning to the country of her origin, subject her husband to the divorce law and the courts of that country, in which he and she never lived stante matrimonio. Redding, 1888. Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th series, xv. p. 1102.]

²⁷ L. 3, 4, D. 50, 1. The subsequent establishment of a separate domicile with the father's approval is not excluded (Savigny, p. 62, note 1, § 353; Guthrie, p. 100, note (t); Phillimore, §§ 89 et seq.; Dicey, p. 97). If a child is legitimated, it obtains the domicile which its father had at the time of the legitimation (Westlake, § 247).

²⁸ In such cases in England the mother is held to have the right when the father is dead, even if the children are lawful (Dicey p. 97). [By the Act 49 and 50 Vict. c. 27, § 2, the mother is entitled to be guardian jointly with any guardian named by the father, or by herself if the father has named none.] Wharton, § 41, note 2, describes it as the view of American practice that, in the case of lawful children, after the father's death the mother can alter the domicile, and even the national domicile, if she acts "reasonably and in good faith." If the mother has entered on a second marriage, it seems to be necessary for her to obtain a decree from the court which exercises the supreme power of guardianship. The practice of the State department at Washington, however, seems to hold that the widow cannot in any case, without the special permission of the proper court, cause her children to lose the citizenship of the United States (Wharton, Dig. 2, § 183 ad fin.).

²⁹ It is obvious that a minor, like any other person who in a legal sense is incapable of an exercise of the will (e.g. one who is unaccountable for his actions, or one who is a declared prodigal), cannot by himself change his domicile. A change of domicile is a legal disposition.

This last question, in so far ³⁰ as the change of domicile is supposed to work a change on personal law, or on the law of nationality, has for a long time been in dispute. If the choice of nationality is conceived as so entirely a personal matter that, as in the law of France, no one can exercise the right for any other, then the question cannot be raised. But apart from this new theory, which first came into existence with the French code, many held that a child in minority kept the last domicile of his dead father.³¹ Others allowed the possibility of a change of domicile, in so far as the curator had no fraudulent intention, e.g. to avail himself of some foreign rule of succession against his ward.³² Others, again, pronounced generally in favour of allowing such a change by an act of the curator.³³ From the point of view of the Roman law, we must assent to this latter view. A change of domicile, however, is not a regular act of administration, and can therefore only take place under the sanction of the supreme curatorial authority.³⁴ But, under this limitation, the question of change of domicile for the minor by his curator is unimportant; the minor and his relations and heirs are, by the approval of this authority being required, kept safe from any treacherous proceedings of the curator with a view to affecting his ward's succession. The opposite view, on the other hand, which would not permit any change of domicile during minority, might at times be very prejudicial to the ward.^{35 36}

PLURALITY OF DOMICILES? PERSONS WITHOUT DOMICILE?

§ 46. The law of Rome unquestionably recognised, after some hesitation, that a person could have more domiciles than one, if he indifferently selected several places as centres of his activity,³⁷ just as, conversely, one might be entirely without a domicile. Savigny (p. 64, § 354; Guthrie, p. 107) puts the following cases in illustration of the latter predicament:—

³² J. Voet, Comm. No. 4, § 10 ad fin.

³³ So, after many doubts, Corn. v. Bynkershoeck, Quæst. jur. priv. 1, c. 16; Rodenburg, ii. tit. 2, c. 1, § 6.

³⁵ The theory of England and the United States is also to the effect that the curator can change his ward's domicile, but only with the approval of the court which has supreme curatorial jurisdiction. Cf. Story, § 506; Wharton, § 42; Westlake, § 250.

³⁶ On the legal domicile which freedmen by the law of Rome had at their patron's residence, see Savigny, § 353.

1. When a previous domicile is renounced, in order to go in quest of a new one, until this is chosen and actually constituted.³⁸

2. When a person has for a long time made travelling his occupation, without having at the same time any home, to which he is in use to return.

3. When a person, without any settled way of life, seeks his subsistence as a tramp or vagabond, by means that are uncertain and dangerous to public safety.³⁹

In Roman law both cases, that of several domiciles, and that of no domicile, were, however, without any considerable importance: for it was merely a general jurisdiction of courts, and not personal right, that was determined according to a man's domicile. In the former case, then, the person in question could be sued in several places as the seats of a general jurisdiction over him. In the latter case, recourse could be had either to a special jurisdiction, or to the general jurisdiction conferred by origo in the Roman sense, i.e. the general jurisdiction of the court of the place where the person enjoyed the right of citizenship.

If, however, the so-called personal law, or law of status, is to be made dependent on the domicile, the possibility of a plurality of domiciles to that effect must be negatived; and, on the other hand, we must hold that a domicile once acquired subsists till a new one is acquired. A plurality of personal laws for one and the same person is just as much a legal impossibility as an absolute lack of domicile.

The jurisprudence of England and the United States has drawn both of these inferences⁴⁰ as a matter of settled law, and by so doing has plainly and consciously withdrawn from the ground of the law of Rome.^{41 42 43}

³⁹ [Held that the forum of a travelling merchant, who had no fixed place of residence, was the place in which he chanced to be for the time. Linn v. Cassadinos, 1881, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th series, viii. p. 849.]

⁴⁰ Cf. Phillimore, §§ 51 et seq.; Foote, p. 11; Dicey, pp. 61 et seq.; Wharton, §§ 72, 73. But it must be noted that English jurists assume the possibility of a plurality of domiciles, in so far as there may be a question as to distinct legal relations of the same person. E.g. it is assumed that a person may have his commercial domicile in A, but his domicile of succession in B. (The so-called commercial domicile comes into play in questions arising during a war, as to whether the ship or the wares of a person are to be regarded as belonging to the enemy. But what is in truth the object of this enquiry in those cases is whether in fact or by presumption of fact the goods come from the enemy's country, or are intended for his behoof. Under certain circumstances, then, the property of a British subject may be held to belong to the enemy [and one man may have two commercial domiciles ("Jonge Classina," 1804. 5 C. Rob. 297).]

The German theory, which, as a general rule, in the same way declares itself for the dependence of the personal law upon the domicile, is less clear and less settled.⁴⁴

APPENDIX.

DOMICILE OF JURISTIC PERSONS: DOMICILE OF INCORPORATED COMPANIES IN PARTICULAR.

§ 47. Domicile is also an attribute of juristic persons. In their case, too, we can conceive of a centre of their activity, that is, of the activity that belongs to them as juristic persons. Many such juristic persons are by their very nature tied down to a particular locality as the centre of their activity, e.g. burghs, village communities, churches, schools, hospitals, etc. In other cases, the domicile is, as a rule, determined by the Statute of Incorporation, or by special legislative enactment.⁴⁵ But such special provisions,⁴⁶ except in so far as they are guaranteed by treaty, have no absolute international validity. They can only be regarded as prima facie proof of the domicile that is alleged. If, for instance, an industrial company which has been in form constituted in State A, has in truth the centre of its business in State B, it is a company belonging to State B,⁴⁷ and subject, therefore, to all the laws of State B, which have an application to the constitution of companies of the kind, and possibly by these laws the constitution or sequestration in bankruptcy of the company may be invalid.⁴⁸ Otherwise the laws of any State, which had been Introd. § 27, is capricious and also inadequate: "If a man has two domiciles, his capacity is to be dealt with and to be determined by the laws of that one of the two jurisdictions which most favours the validity of the transaction." What is the law in the case of intestate succession, according to this statute?

⁴⁴ English jurisprudence regards domicile as so pre-eminently a matter of fact that the limitations imposed by foreign systems of law on the acquisition of a domicile in their dominions are simply disregarded, in so far as legal relations which depend on the acquisition of a foreign domicile, but come up for decision in an English Court, are concerned (Foote, p. 23).

⁴⁶ Cf. German Code of Civil Procedure, § 19: "The court of general jurisdiction for communities, corporations, and all companies, associations, or other combinations of persons, and all foundations, establishments, and collections of assets or property, which can be sued as such, is determined by their seat. Unless some other seat is plainly discoverable, the place where the management of the concern is carried on is held to be the seat."

enacted in the public interest for the formation of companies,⁴⁹ might in the simplest possible way be evaded. The establishment of a branch is not a change of the domicile, and by no means subjects the company in all respects to the laws of the place where the branch is set up (Judgment of the Trib. Corr. Seine of 10th February 1881. Jour. viii. p. 158). But a real change of domicile can only be carried out,⁵⁰ if the company or corporation, besides actually transporting the seat of its administration, observes also those legislative provisions which are required at its new domicile for the establishment for the first time of a juristic person or company of the kind. To attempt to place the company under a law different from that of its real domicile, by merely going through the statutory forms, would in law have no effect; and, on the other hand, an actual change of domicile by itself would simply withdraw from the juristic person or company its legal foundation. From that time onwards, it could only be considered as a de facto partnership,⁵¹ unless, of course, there was some special statutory provision for this case.

[The law of England as to foreign trading companies and incorporations is stated in Lindley on Company Law, p. 909, and is in substantial conformity with the doctrines of the text. He quotes a convention concluded between England and France, the first article of which provides: "The high contracting parties declare that they mutually grant to all companies and other associations, commercial, industrial, or financial, constituted and authorised in conformity with the laws in force in either of the two countries, the power of exercising all their rights and of appearing before the tribunals, whether for the purpose of bringing an action or for defending the same, throughout the dominions and possessions of the other power, subject to the sole condition of conforming to the laws of such dominions and possessions." Similar conventions are concluded with Belgium, Italy, Germany, Spain, and Greece. For further discussion of the subject, see below, §§ 104-108, and relative note.]

⁵⁰ So Vavasseur, Jour. ii. pp. 350, 351. Judgment of Court of Brussels, 14th October 1870, reported by Dubois, Rev. iv. p. 154.

⁵¹ A change of the seat of an incorporated company, is plainly not the same thing as an alteration of the objects of the undertaking; on this account (cf. Art. 215, subsec. i. of the German Code of Commerce) it may be resolved on by a majority of the company (cf. Renaud, Rechtliche Gutachten, pub. by Hergenhausen, 1886, i. p. 214). This conclusion must, however, be confined to the case of a change of domicile within the territory. In any case, this raises no proper question of private international law; but is simply dependent on the legal system of the country which has for the first time settled the rights of the company as against its individual members. Against the possibility of transferring the seat of the company into another State by the resolution of a majority, see Vavasseur ut cit. and a judgment of the French Court of Cassation, 7th June 1880 (Jour. viii. pp. 263 et seq.) In agreement with the text, see judgment of Imperial Court, i. on 5th January 1862 (Dec. vii. p. 69, Seuffert, 38, No. 243).

II. NATIONALITY.¹

A. HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT.

§ 48. The ancients made the so-called law of the person depend on descent and not on domicile. Law, religion, and civilisation were closely connected:² they were matters of race and of family, a natural position, since law and the State are developed out of the family. The Metoeci in Greece, the Peregrini, who lived in Rome, did not enjoy the personal law of the State although resident in its territory. (So long as distinctions were still recognised within the Roman Empire, personal rights were determined by origo,³ in the Roman sense, i.e. the citizenship of any

² Cf. Cogordan, La Nationalité, Paris 1879, p. 20. On the law of citizenship and the law of foreigners in the States of antiquity, see A. Pierantoni, Trattato di diritto internazionale, vol. i. Rome 1881. (Prolegomena . . . Storia dall'antichità al 1400.)

³ See in general on this subject Savigny, §§ 351 et seq.; Guthrie, pp. 88 et seq. Apparently the state of things in Rome, according to which the whole dominions of the State fell into certain burghal divisions (Stadt-bezirke), had its origin in the fact that the land and soil and their inhabitants had belonged to particular States or towns which at one time had sovereign power. The natural result was that citizenship and not domicile determined the so-called law of the person. We cannot assent to Savigny's assumption that there were subjects of the Roman Empire, who were not—at least passively—citizens of some particular city, and that personal law could, in any part of the Roman Empire, have been dependent on domicile. Savigny thinks that a right of citizenship in a particular city was not enjoyed by the following persons:—

(1) Foreigners who happened to be admitted to the Roman Empire as inhabitants, but had never been admitted as citizens of any particular city.

(2) Citizens of any city who had been loosed from its municipal society without having been admitted to any other municipal community.

(3) Lastly, the freedmen of the lowest class, who were dediticiorum numero, and belonged to no particular community.

But it is very improbable, and no proof of the theory is adduced, that any one could have been received into the Roman Empire without acquiring the citizenship of a particular city, especially as thereby he might have withdrawn himself from the burdens and taxes of the cities, which are known to have been so heavy, and for the sure payment of which all kinds of precautions were taken. The same reason argues against the possibility of the second class of exceptions, and a favourable position of that kind is certainly not to be assumed to have existed in the case of the Dediticii. It is true that they had no active rights as citizens, but we certainly cannot exempt this class of person, who were generally at a disadvantage, from the burdens of citizenship. If, however, all persons in all places were at least in a passive sense citizens, there is no particular town.) It was but seldom that foreigners were received into the national community with full rights of citizenship, and, as a rule, an act of the legislative authority was required to effect it. It was only in the later days of the Roman Empire, when it set out to develop a world-wide empire, that the Civitas Romana was frequently given. In accordance with the theocracy of the Jewish State, the true question with them was whether the stranger adopted the faith and the ritual of the Jewish people.⁴

Originally it was just the same among the Germani. But, as we have noted, this race was less exclusive, and the same striving after freedom to choose, each for himself, a fellowship or community, with which is associated the development of the unions of retainers or followers of a chief, seems at an early date to have made it possible to receive strangers into the full community of the place or of the clan. No doubt, says the Lex Salica (45), the foreigner must retire, if only one of the existing community raises an objection to him; but if any one has remained unchallenged for a year and a day, he can no longer be expelled, and he has become a comrade (Genosse) in the full sense.⁵ This is the origin from which gradually sprang the rule that domicile, at first only a domicile that had lasted for a year and a day, is the determinant of personal law.

In truth, domicile and the acquisition of a right of citizenship—if the latter is not confined to members of the same race—are distinguished only by this fact, that in the case of domicile the stranger is tacitly admitted into the community of law, while in acquiring citizenship he is expressly so admitted. No importance will, however, attach to the necessity of an express admission to citizenship which may, from motives of expediency or of caprice, be refused by the commonwealth that is concerned, unless special political rights or duties, as the case may be, are associated with this admission. From the end of the Middle Ages onwards, after the great mass of the people had lost all political rights, that was no longer the case; and thus, to take an example, the question whether a man, who had settled in France, was a Frenchman or not, had no further meaning than that in the former case the droit d'aubaine could not be exercised. Naturalisation, reason left for regarding domicile even in a subsidiary sense as regulative of personal rights. Personal rights were a privilege of rank or class—favorabile or odiosum—and it is at variance with the nature of such a privilege to suppose it to be dependent on the capricious choice of domicile by an individual. In favour of this view and against Savigny, see Nüscheler, Beiträge zur Geschichte des Heimathlichen Gerichtstandes, Zürich 1880, pp. 5 et seq., especially pp. 10 and 11. (Those who, as persons without citizenship, are called ἀπολίδες—see L. 17, § 1; D. de poenis, 48, 19—are persons, in the law of Rome, who are incapable of all those legal relations which belonged to the jus civile, persons who, as a punishment, are afflicted with a kind of civil death.) (Forum originis, in the modern sense, is the jurisdiction of the domicile of the father or mother as the case may be, which, no doubt, used in older practice to be assumed as a subsidiary jurisdiction in general in the case of persons who had no domicile at all.

which, as a name merely, was known before the first revolution, was simply a renunciation of this right made in advance. It was only in cities, where there was still some meaning attached to the political rights of individuals, although that meaning was often a very narrow one, that in certain relations importance was still given to a special acquisition of the rights of citizenship.⁶ The reverse, however, was the general rule.⁷ For the rest, domicile and nationality were generally identified with each other, a thing which it was all the easier to do, as no distinction was made between foreigners and strangers, even as regarded exile or expatriation. There is no doubt that persons born in France or in England were at once regarded as French⁸ or Englishmen, as the case might be. According to feudal theories, they might in a certain sense be looked upon as products of the soil, while in France the children of French parents who had been born abroad were also counted as French.⁹ Upon the whole, however, this nationality had no further meaning than as a certain favourable position for the individuals concerned. It excluded the application of the jus albinagii from those persons who enjoyed it, and made them to the fullest extent of legal capacity. At the same time, too, nationality of this kind was capable of being employed in a more capricious way in international concerns. The interests of citizens of this kind served as an occasion for interventions in matters of public law, and such citizens could be more justly than foreigners enlisted as soldiers or pressed as sailors, although in earlier periods the question of citizenship was not much stirred in such matters. Nationality might seem to be a matter of indifference in determining the law of the person. Within the same State, as a general rule, a maze of the most various rules of private law was recognised, and across the frontier of the State the same variety often prevailed as was found in the different quarters of the State itself. How could the idea that the fact of belonging to a State (a fact which seemed, in so far as questions of private law were concerned, to be quite irrelevant) should be the determinant of personal law ever arise? This is the explanation of the circumstance that the question of nationality was most superficially considered.

⁶ In the period between the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries, the principle that, for the law of the person, the law of membership of the canton, and not the domicile, was regulative, was recognised in many of the Swiss cantons, especially in those which, on the one hand, enjoyed a complete freedom, or at least a ruling position, and, on the other hand, had not been affected by the levelling influences of the jurisprudence of the common law. It was even in earlier times recognised in these cantons, that the canton in which any one enjoyed the rights of citizenship was obliged to receive him if he should fall into poverty. Cf. Wyss, at cit. sup. pp. 54 et seq., and in more detail the paper by Nussleier, pp. 51 et seq., cited above.

⁸ This rule is found in France from the days of Charles the Great. Cf. Fellerille, p. 23.

⁹ We also meet here and there with the theory, that the place of birth involves an attachment as citizen to that territory, only if the parents have their domicile there.

B. GENERAL IMPORT OF NATIONALITY IN INTERNATIONAL INTERCOURSE.

§ 49. But things necessarily changed when the subjects of different States began to have important political rights conceded to them, and when comprehensive systems of private law were devised for the whole State, and they changed still more when the banishment of natives of the State began gradually more and more to be looked upon as an inadmissible measure. The gift of political rights was necessarily associated with a special declaration of adoption on the part of the State, or with some protracted stay in the territory, or with some other conditions precedent.

To the legislation of the first French revolution belongs the merit of having first distinctly grappled with the question of nationality, although at the outset with much hesitation and many mistakes in detail, and of having more correctly estimated its meaning. This legal system, too, was the first that logically made the so-called law of the person dependent on nationality and not on domicile.

Nationality,¹ as we have already remarked, is one of the axioms of international law, and unquestionably it is primarily dependent on the legal enactments of each individual State; each individual State will always, in the first place, have to decide whether, in accordance with its own legal system, any particular person is to be recognised as belonging to it or not.² But apart from the question, which we shall afterwards discuss, whether the law of the person is to be determined by the law of his domicile or by that of his nationality, there is no doubt that to private international law belongs the discussion of the problem, as to what principles are the most practical for settling the acquisition and the loss of nationality, as also the discussion of possible cases of conflict, of cases in which two or more States at the same time each and all claim some individual as belonging to them, or seem to do so; and, on the other hand, of the converse cases that all the States that can possibly come into consideration, refuse an individual nationality in any of them.³

C. VARIOUS PRINCIPLES. THE PLACE OF BIRTH (JUS SOLI). DESCENT (JUS SANGUINIS). MIXED PRINCIPLE (THE PRINCIPLE OF ASSIMILATION).

§ 50. It is now more and more widely recognised, that the place of birth, which is determined by pure accident, should have nothing to say in determining nationality, but that the question must be made to depend on descent.⁴ But still we cannot look on the principle of the place of birth, the jus soli, as completely set aside.⁵ It is still held by England and the United States along with⁶ the principle of descent; in the Republics of South America and in Venezuela it is still recognised to the full, and here and there it is argued in support of this view, that an exclusive recognition of the principle of descent would lead to this, that there might easily be a number of families who should for generations keep themselves from becoming naturalised, while they in fact enjoy all the advantages of nationality—for in matters of private law the foreigner and the native enjoy exactly the same legal capacity—but escape from the special burdens of citizens, such as military service. They may also, it is said, by invoking the protection of foreign powers, in certain circumstances become a danger to the very State which has hospitably received them.

¹ The statutes of a great number of nations as to nationality are, at least in their main provisions, to be found in Beach-Lawrence, iii. pp. 194 et seq.; in Cogordan (cf. especially p. 429) and Weiss, pp. 255 et seq. Cogordan besides gives a literal translation of the enactments.

² Blütschli, Völkerrecht, § 374; Fiore, § 53: cf. too, the judgments of the Swiss Bundesgericht, 21st April 1882, Martin, Rev. xvi. p. 489; Cogordan, p. 278. We must not, however, infer, as the last-named writer does, that it is only the courts of the State concerned that have jurisdiction to decide when a dispute arises as to the acquisition or the loss of citizenship.

³ "Questions as to citizenship are determined by municipal law in subordination to the law of nations" (Wharton, Dig. ii. p. 234).

As a matter of fact, the system of descent carried out in its fulness,⁷ results in an unreality, so soon as the stranger, as is substantially the case nowadays, enjoys the like rights as the native, while religion and customs

⁶ Cf. Wharton, Dig. 2, § 183. It is, however, laid down that if a father, himself a foreigner, takes a child born in the United States out of the country with him, that child ceases to be an American citizen. A man born in the United States is, on the other hand, allowed the right, after attaining majority (with this limitation, no doubt, that it must be soon after attaining it), of unequivocally declaring his intention of becoming a citizen of the United States, and of thereby acquiring that right of citizenship. The retention or abandonment of the domicile is regarded as decisive, and therefore it is at least doubtful whether a widow, who is a foreigner, by transferring her domicile again to a foreign country and taking her children with her, without the leave of the supreme curatorial authority, will expatriate the children. (Cf. Wharton, Dig. 2, p. 401.) Decision of the Circuit Court of California, 29th September 1883, reported by Lebreton (Jour. xiv. pp. 230 et seq.). The son, too, of a Chinaman born in the United States becomes an American citizen, and, consequently, if he travels to China and returns again, he is not affected by the prohibition against the landing of Chinese labourers.

[In Great Britain the character of citizen is acquired (1) by birth in Great Britain or the dominions of the Queen; (2) by descent (4 Geo. II. c. 21, § 1); (3) by naturalisation, denization, and resumption of British nationality. Denization is granted by the Crown; naturalisation by the Secretary of State on application made to him by persons who have resided for five years in the United Kingdom, or served under the Crown for that period, and intend to continue so residing or serving; resumption of nationality is effected on the same conditions by British subjects who have become aliens, and, therefore, by a widow who has been married to an alien. Naturalisation and resumption of nationality carry the rights of citizenship to infant children residing with their father or mother (33 & 34 Vict. c. 14, §§ 7 & 8).]

⁷ The law of the German Empire of 1st June 1870 is based purely on the principle of descent, but on that very account has already led to many inconveniences, and in particular to evasions of the obligation to military service. No doubt banishment may be used as a have ceased to maintain any strict division between the members of different nations. At the same time, however, it would not be desirable to take a residence in any country for a considerable period as a ground on which by itself to set up a claim to nationality. The necessary duration of any such residence cannot be fixed with any certainty, and the individual concerned is in the same way quite unconscious of any such definite period. The question whether a domicile has been established at all at a particular place is frequently matter of doubt: it would be much more difficult to say at what point of time a domicile began to exist. For a residence, which at first was thought to be merely temporary, may imperceptibly turn into a true domicile. On this account, the course which French jurisprudence of more modern date has opened out, seems to have much more to recommend it. It holds⁸ a residence, which may be presumed to have lasted through two generations, to found nationality to this effect, that, if a father was born in France, his son, being also born in France, becomes at once a Frenchman. Birth is a circumstance the date of which can be fixed with sufficient precision, and it will only be in very rare cases that the births in one family will take place for two generations in a country in which that family is not, as a matter of fact, firmly established. But all objections will lose their point, if the child is allowed by some formal act, which is to be gone through before an official within a fixed period, to preserve its right to the nationality to which it belongs by descent. We may, perhaps, fitly call this system the principle of pre-compulsitor against foreigners, who in fact, if not in law, have become citizens, but at the same time neglect to obtain naturalisation. Such a measure, however, is very severe, and is easily represented as odious, while it by no means removes all the evils that are attendant upon the position. See Martitz, ut cit. [By the German statute the quality of citizenship is acquired either (1) by descent; (2) by legitimation; (3) by marriage; (4) by reception (Annahme), in the case of a citizen passing from one State of the empire to another; (5) by naturalisation in the case of foreigners. Neither adoption nor domicile will give the quality of citizen. Foreigners are admitted to be naturalised on proof that they are sui juris by their own law, and of good character; that they have a residence or trading establishment in Germany; and that they have the means of providing for themselves and their families. Naturalisation and reception are both acts of the Government.] In the debates of the Institutes, the evils of this position seem not to have been kept in view: there the pure principle of descent was adopted, and a necessary exception was made solely in the case of foundlings.

sumptive assimilation. More modern French legislation is [to some extent] in accord with this principle. It allows a child [domiciled in France at the date of his majority], and born in France of a father who is a foreigner,⁹ the liberty, within a year after attaining majority, to decide by a formal declaration for the nationality which depends on his descent.¹⁰ The proposal we make could not be adopted in France exactly as we have made it, without surrendering a principle to which French legislation and French jurisprudence obstinately believe themselves bound to adhere. That is the principle that, in all cases in which the choice or the determination of nationality is referred to the will of the individual, the declaration is pre-eminently a personal matter, which cannot be satisfied by any declaration or any act of the father or of the guardian. Thus French legislation is forced to defer the necessary declaration till the majority of the child born in France.¹¹ But that involves the evil that, till majority is attained, we remain uncertain as to the eventual nationality of the person concerned, although for the time, in matters of private law, he is treated as French. For instance, we do not know whether he can be admitted to the military schools;¹² and again, the choice comes into play at the very moment at which there is most probability of an attempt by the young man to withdraw himself from the claims of his country from selfish motives.¹³ The additional limitation

¹⁰ Besides, French jurisprudence is defective in so far as it holds to the absolute operation of the jus sanguinis in the case of foreign countries. It ought to recognise that, in the same cases in which a child born in France becomes French, a child born abroad of French parents comes into the world as a foreigner, provided always that the foreign State concerned concedes its nationality to a child born within its bounds. See, as to conflicts of the kind in relation to the descendants of French parents, Daireaux, Jour. xiii. pp. 422 et seq. I cannot, however, assent to the suggestion there made as to the proper principle, which is really the same as that of Martitz, to be noticed below.

¹¹ According to the legislation of 1889, this declaration is to take place within a year after majority. Cf. Weiss, p. 300.

imposed by the law of 1889, according to which it is only permissible, in cases such as those described in note 12, to claim a foreign nationality if the claimant can prove its continued subsistence, is very proper in itself, but is scarcely sufficient to prevent undesirable abuses of the laws of hospitality such as have been indicated.¹⁴

We may recommend the following provisions for international treaties, and generally for legislation,¹⁵ viz.:—

“Nationality is founded on descent: provided that birth in the territory of a State founds nationality there, if the father, or, in the case of bastards, the mother, was born in that territory, unless within a period of six months, reckoning from the child's birth, the father, or mother, or guardian, as the case may be, makes a formal declaration before the proper official of the place of birth, that the child shall retain the nationality of the father, or of the mother, as the case may be.¹⁶ This declaration must be to sons of foreigners, born in France, of claiming French nationality, as described in the last note, it further provides: “S'il est âgé de moins de vingt et un ans accomplis la déclaration sera faite en son nom par son père; en cas de décès par sa mère; en cas de décès du père et de la mère, ou de leur exclusion de la tutelle . . . par le tuteur autorisé par délibération du conseil de famille.”

¹⁵ The provisions of the French law have obtained a very general assent. In Luxemburg (cf. Cogordan, pp. 54 et seq.), however, a further condition is required for the acquisition of nationality by the child of the second generation, being born in Luxemburg, viz. that the father should, up to the date of the child's birth, have had his domicile in Luxemburg. The government had proposed simply to adopt the French principle. The council of Luxemburg, on the other hand, maintained that nationality should not be allowed to be acquired simply by omission, and possibly by positive neglect, and desired in every case an “acte authentique” to establish a change of nationality. But it is just such things as the acquisition and retention of a domicile that are least susceptible of being established by an authentic act. If, as the council desired, it is proposed to protect the State against a tacit acquisition of nationality by undeserving persons, that would be better ensured by a provision by which State officials should be allowed, within a certain period, reckoned from the birth of the child (or from the intimation of the birth at the proper office), to lodge objections to the acquisition of nationality, and that this should prevent its being acquired. This is the only possible method of really referring the acquisition or non-acquisition of nationality, as the case might be, to an authentic act. If a principle such as that recommended in the text were adopted, there would be no need of the principle of law of the United States (cf. Beach-Lawrence on the Acts of 10th Feb. 1855), by which citizenship no doubt passes from father to children, but not to the descendants of persons who have never stayed in the United States, so that the right of citizenship is extinguished in the second generation born abroad. A negative rule of that kind, although it proceeds from the correct principle, that the rule of descent, if recognised in infinitum, leads at last to an unreality, seems suspicious, because its tendency is to increase the number of “the homeless.”

¹⁶ Martitz, ut cit. 1146, recommends the following amendment for the German statute, viz.: “But every person shall be treated as a citizen, who is born within the German Empire, of parents who have settled here with the intention of not returning to their homes: it may be accompanied by evidence of the nationality of the father, or of the mother, as the case may be. In the case of an attestation by the authorities of the foreign State being wanting, the court of the place of birth decides as to the import of the evidence."

As a necessary consequence, powers of guardianship, as the analogous French law would require, must be vested in the State where the birth takes place, but, of course, at the same time must protect the interests of the ward, with reference e.g. to his family circumstances.

CHILDREN WHOSE PARENTS ARE UNKNOWN (FOUNDLINGS). ILLEGITIMATE DESCENT.

§ 51. In the case of children whose parents are unknown, necessity requires that the place of birth, or the place where they are found, should determine their nationality.^{17 18}

In determining nationality, it should in all reason be matter of indifference that the mother has not recognised the child, if, on the other hand, it that such a person may be allowed to certify that he has continued to be a citizen of another country by means of a declaration by its authorities."

But, in the first place, the intention of the parents in such a matter may in many cases be very doubtful. Again, the rule proposed will in this guise very nearly throw over the principle of nationality, and substitute for it that of domicile. It is well adapted for the regulation of the duty of military service, but not for the determination of relations of civil law. Laurent, iii. §§ 109 et seq., cf. Avant projet, art. 40, proposes that a child of a foreigner born in Belgium should at once be claimed for Belgium, reserving a power of option to be exercised at a later date. The foundation of this claim is not very plausible. A child born in Belgium is not on that account brought up there (two things which Laurent, in giving an illustration, at once identifies with each other), and has not necessarily any special "attachment" to the State where it is born. More tolerable and better is the 8th article of the Italian statute book, which introduces a provision of the same kind, in the event of the father having had a residence for ten years in Italy. "Homelessness" is no doubt in the actual sense of the term an evil, but legal systems are not intended to capture souls.

is certain that she gave birth to it; it should also be unimportant that in other matters the law denies all legal effects, even to the child's relationship with its mother, on the ground that the procreation of the child was a criminal act. A child should not for these reasons be placed on a footing with a foundling, whose parents really are unknown. In determining nationality, actual facts in nature must, as far as possible, be taken as the foundation, and not artificial and more or less capricious fictions, although they be based upon pretended considerations of morality.¹⁹ Again, how can we compel a foreign State to take such a child as a citizen, if by accident, for instance, it has been born just across the frontier of its mother's native State, while the mother, as happens in most cases, has taken the child back with her to her own home. The German statute, § 3, provides very rightly in this simple and comprehensive way, without making distinctions, viz. :—"Illegitimate children acquire the nationality of their mother."

Again, it is no good reason for making bastards follow the nationality of their father, that he has to some extent, short of legitimation, recognised them.²⁰ The foundation of the whole system of a child's personal rights should not be allowed to depend on acts²¹ like these, informal and often more or less doubtful.

DATE OF BIRTH DECISIVE.

§ 52. According to the strict principle of descent, the logical result would be that the nationality of a child should be determined, not by the time of its birth, but by that of its conception. The child would acquire the nationality which the father or the mother, as the case might be, had at the date of conception. But, nevertheless, we shall find it sounder to adhere to the date of the birth, as the date of the conception is uncertain.²² In French jurisprudence, too, the weight of authority is to this

²⁰ This is the rule of French jurisprudence. But Cogordan rightly declares for the other view, pp. 27 et seq. He gives most weight to the doubt whether the child will give his assent to the opposite rule; for no one can acquire the rights of a father over a stranger child by any procedure he pleases: what is, too, to be the result, if several persons of different nationalities thus recognise the child?

²¹ Strictly speaking, French law requires recognition of the child by the mother.

²² The Roman law, no doubt, in questions of status had regard in case of legitimate birth to the date of the conception. Gai. i. §§ 89-91 (cf. L. 11, D. de statu hom. 4, 5). But in such cases regard was always had in truth to that moment, within the possible period of conception, which was most favourable to the child's legal capacity. It is this favour to the child, which makes him a civis Romanus if the father, at any moment within the period of possible conception, was himself a civis Romanus. But nowadays one cannot say that a child will certainly be in a better position according as he takes up this or that nationality.

effect, in correspondence with the words of the French law.²³ But it is plain that, from the point of view of the French law, there is an illogicality in this position. For it will not under any circumstances allow parents any influence at all upon the nationality of their children, and yet they are allowed such an influence if the naturalisation of the parents in the interval between conception and the birth is to alter the nationality of the child.

LEGITIMATION.

§ 53. The legitimation of a child has the effect of elevating a natural relationship into one that the law will recognise, and it operates therefore to make the nationality of the child follow that of the father.²⁴ It is therefore, as French jurisprudence in regard to the recognition of a child also admits, to be regarded more correctly not as a privileged form of naturalisation, but as a legal declaration of a natural fact already in existence, and therefore has ipso jure^{25 26} an operative and retrospective effect.²⁷ It stands, therefore, in the same position as the subsequent discovery of the parentage of a foundling would stand.²⁸

²⁵ Some Austrian authors, and among them Unger (p. 294), deny that the legitimated children of an Austrian are by Austrian law citizens of that country. But we are not driven to that conclusion by the use of the word "Geburt" in the Austrian statute book, corresponding to the word "né" in the French code. See, on the other side, in particular Vesque v. Püttlingen, p. 85, who seems, however, illogically to deny a retrospective operation to legitimation, or who has not clear ideas as to the benefit of such a retrospective operation.

²⁷ Cogordan, p. 32, Folleville, p. 115, Weiss, p. 31. On the other hand, the latest French legislation on nationality rejects, to some extent, a retrospective effect. Logically, in such questions, the nationality of the father at the date of the birth must rule. But it is equally true that, if the father has subsequently acquired a different nationality, then, according to the rule of the unity of that family, which lies at the root of the German system, the child follows this latter nationality, and it certainly in that event has no retrospective effect. French law is different from this.

With adoption, however, the result is otherwise.²⁹ It is a purely capricious act, and one entirely apart from the natural relation of descent. French jurisprudence refuses to allow adoption to have any effect on nationality. This can also be expressly provided, as in the last paragraph of § 2 of the German statute.

D. IMPORT OF THE LAW OF NATIONALITY.

(RIGHTS AND DUTIES.)

§ 54. Up to this time, we have not touched the question as to what the idea of nationality imports, what the rights and duties on the part of the individual and of the State which it involves are. This discussion, as a matter of fact, has been left untouched by very many authors, and in international law it might be possible to evade it, and commit it to the law of the individual State, were it not that the question, whether an individual's nationality in regard to a particular State has ceased, is very closely dependent on the solution of this other question, viz. whether the individual has established a nationality for himself in some other State. If, then, by the term nationality different things are understood in different States, this would give rise to general confusion, and far-reaching collisions between States.

We have already said above that the acquisition of a domicile in itself,¹ so far as this depends simply on the free will of the individual, cannot constitute the idea of nationality. But just as little can the acquisition of political rights be a condition precedent of nationality. For there have legitimation carried out in conformity with legal requirements." From the use of the word "acquires" one might suppose, and this is in fact Cogordan's view ut sup. cit. that German law regards legitimation as a kind of naturalisation, which would bear some analogy to the naturalisation of a wife by her marriage, and would therefore give ground for holding that § 3 adduces legitimation as a special ground for acquiring a nationality, along with descent, marriage, and naturalisation. But the expression of the German statute is upon the whole not very exact. The enumeration in § 2 shows this: for either the acquisition of nationality by legitimation belongs to the head of naturalisation, or else it is an acquisition by descent, but in a juristic sense it is impossible that it should be a third means of acquiring nationality of an entirely different character. Again, it is not strictly correct to say "by birth . . . legitimated children of a German acquire his nationality. . . ." It should run, "Legitimate children of a German, who at the time of their birth was a German, are German, even although their birth takes place abroad." There is, however, no idea here of a special act of acquisition. In these circumstances, we do not feel ourselves compelled to determine questions by the words of the statute, if these are at variance with the nature of the subject.

²⁹ Cf. Cogordan, p. 33, Vesque v. Püttlingen, p. 84, who obtains the same result for Austrian law from general principles. See, too, on p. 86, the practice of the Hungarian ministry of the interior.

been, and still are, in many States, classes of persons who are without political rights, and yet no one on that account thinks of doubting their nationality.² We must, however, recognise the exercise of political rights in the proper sense,—and, as Karminski (p. 17) very properly remarks, we mean by that not all public rights, but only those that have in view some participation in the control of the State, either directly or through the different communities found within the State,—as an important indication that a person or a family is counted to have any particular nationality. The exercise of political rights by foreigners is always an exception. On the other hand, there are cases, although at the present day they are exceptional, in which, either from force of custom, or it may be by virtue of some special enactment, foreigners, e.g. persons who are owners of particular estates in the country, exercise political rights, e.g. are members of a chamber of peers.³

On the other hand, it is no sign of nationality to be subject to the system of private law in any particular State, and in the same way it is possible for a State to go so far as to extend diplomatic protection to persons who are not in truth its permanent subjects.^{4 5} Conversely, it may refuse that protection to certain persons, although they do belong to it, for the reason e.g. that they have shown themselves unworthy of this protection, or by some breach of the law have forfeited⁶ their claims to such protection.⁷ There is then hardly anything left except the indefeas-

² Cf., in recent times, Wharton (Jour. xiii. p. 541) on the instructions of the diplomatic representatives of the United States.

⁴ The United States extend diplomatic protection to persons who have not as yet become citizens, if they are domiciled in the United States, and have made a declaration of their intention of becoming citizens: except in questions with the country from which they came, if by its laws the existing bond of allegiance is not dissolved, and if the persons in question have voluntarily betaken themselves to her territory. See, on that subject, Wharton, Jour. xiii. pp. 537 et seq. See Woolsey, Int. Law, § 81, on the case of Koszta, which partly belongs to this subject.

⁶ It is notorious that to levy direct taxes from any person does not imply a recognition of his nationality. See below, § 107.

⁷ Stoerk, in v. Holtzendorff's Völkerr. 2, § 115 (pp. 594 and 596), proposes to find in the idea of nationality a complete legal subjection to the personal majesty (what is the meaning of that ?) of the State, and an entering into the unity (?) of the national law of status. That is to say, he thinks that with nationality the so-called personal statutes are at once conferred. He regards the connection, which is recognised "in some territories," of the so-called personal law with domicile as only "of local effect." I must say, however, that although I have declared myself in favour of determining personal law in future legislation in Germany according to the principle of nationality, I must at the same time refuse to hold the principle of domicile which is still recognised in the most extensive empires, to be a purely particular institute, or an arrangement with nothing but local effects.

ible right of residence⁸ in the State, the right to live there.⁹ For, however far a State may go in hospitably receiving foreigners, still foreigners who are dangerous to the community, or in need of relief from the poor law, may be refused a right of residence, and in extraordinary cases at least that right may be limited by special legislation to some other effect.¹⁰ On the other hand, no State can in these days effectively refuse to receive back into its own territory subjects of its own, who have been rejected by a foreign country. The banishment of a State's own subjects, a power which is still sometimes exercised as an exceptional political measure, in truth can only be exercised with the knowledge that it is contrary to the rules of public law, and that it is impossible to carry it out in so far as other States refuse to receive the exiles.¹¹

E. LOSS OF ONE NATIONALITY WITHOUT A CONTEMPORANEOUS ACQUISITION OF ANOTHER?

RELEASE FROM THE STATE TIES.

§ 55. As the State cannot with full effect declare that persons who have once belonged to it have lost their right of residence on its territories,¹ so we must also deny its power to do so, on the ground that any person has spent a long time abroad, without having fulfilled certain duties which he owed to it, the State where he had his home.² Indeed, considering that in this question we are dealing not only with the interests of the individual,

¹¹ Muheim, pp. 38, 39, combats both the conception of nationality as a right of residence in the State, and the obligation to loyalty which arises from that right. The latter belongs, he thinks, to feudal law, is not in accord with democracy, and is in contradiction to the fact that in Switzerland, for example, an individual can have rights of citizenship in several cantons (Indigénate). The right of citizenship in the commune may, he thinks, supply a foundation for a right of citizenship in the State. But it is not easy to see why one should not be under an obligation of loyalty to a State with a democratic constitution. Again, the combination of several cantonal citizenships, if the cantonal communities are closely united, so that a conflict of duties seems hardly conceivable, may very well co-exist with the obligation to loyalty. The possibility, therefore, of a plurality of cantonal citizenships proves nothing. Finally, it is no doubt quite possible that one, by simply being received into a local community, may become a citizen of the State to which that community belongs. It is simply a domestic detail of the constitution, whether each local community has the privilege of turning foreigners into subjects indirectly, by receiving them into its own body; then if the persons, who are thus received by a community, cannot be afterwards expelled by the State, they have acquired its nationality, although they may lack many political rights. On the other hand, the State authority may make the acquisition of nationality dependent on a prior acquisition of a right of residence in some local community. In that case, the final right of residence in the State, and as a consequence the right of residence in the particular community, is conditioned by the acquisition of nationality, although the community can raise no objection to the acquisition of the local citizenship.

In pages 56 and 57, Muheim argues against the obligation of loyalty being incumbent on subjects, on the ground that it is inconsistent with the freedom of emigration, which would then become a breach of faith, while on the other hand the State would have the right of cutting any one free from its ties, who had in any way broken his obligation of loyalty. But such a relation of loyalty need not be eternal; it is quite reconcilable with the idea of it, that it should be capable of being dissolved. Although the servant owes his master fidelity, and the vassal his lord, it is not meant that both of these obligations are to last for life.

but that we must also take into account the rights of the other States, even an express renunciation by the individual of his rights of nationality, or a release of him by the State with his own consent from the ties that bind a subject, can in this matter make no difference.³ Still less, of course, can it be decisive of the question that the person has left his fatherland without any intention of returning to it.⁴ The general interests of international legal order imperatively demand that every one should belong to some particular State,⁵ and that no one should be without a home.⁶ Would it, on the other hand, be possible to suppose that an indigent person should be tossed like a football from one State to another, or should be exposed somewhere on a desert island, or that—supposing personal law to be dependent on nationality—he should have no personal law at all? We come, then, to the conclusion that any provisions, which on any grounds you please declare that a man has lost his rights of citizenship,⁷ and even a sentence of dismissal from all the ties that bind a subject, mean primarily no more than this, that the State shall no longer be bound to afford diplomatic protection abroad to persons who have been so declared to have lost their rights, or to have been dismissed, and that the exercise of political rights shall cease at the

⁴ If we do not require, to constitute expatriation, i.e. to give rise to the loss of nationality, the acquisition of another nationality, it is correct not to require from the emigrant the positive determination never to return, all we require in that case is the want of a distinct intention to return. (Cf. v. Martitz, pp. 1148, 1149.) But in that case expatriation is hardly distinguishable from a change or abandonment of domicile; and as it is desired to distinguish between domicile and nationality, the existence of an animus non revertendi has been postulated as a condition of emigration that is to imply a loss of nationality. Such an animus can only be demonstrated to exist in the most exceptional cases, as Martitz rightly notes. As a general rule, the individual will regard his return or non-return as dependent on uncertain events, e.g. upon whether he succeeds or not.

⁵ Cogordan, p. 17, places at the head of the three fundamental rules which he regards as necessary this rule, viz.: "Every man must belong to a particular State." ("Que tout homme doit posséder une nationalité.") So, too, Folleville, pp. xiv. et seq. That agrees, as we see, with the rule which the jurisprudence of England and the United States has set up with regard to national domicile. This, too, cannot be lost until a new one is acquired.

⁶ The word "heimathlos" (homeless) has passed over from German into international literature, especially in France. We find there the expression "le heimathlosat." Besides, this word is used to describe the condition of persons who desire, as far as it is feasible, to have no home, and so withdraw themselves from the burdens which any nationality would lay upon them, and particularly from military service (cf. Cogordan, p. 10).

moment at which the dismissal takes effect.⁸ On the other hand, these declarations leave the person so dismissed full freedom of movement, and the State neither can nor will claim from him the performance of any special duties founded on his allegiance; and further, the principles of criminal law which postulate the character of citizen have no application to his case. In so far, however, as the personal law of the individual depends on his nationality, that nationality must of necessity remain in existence until a new one is acquired, and in like manner the obligation of the State to receive him again, if need be, must also continue to subsist.⁹

§ 56. Inasmuch, then, as there is a complete freedom of emigration, an emigrant should be given, not a release from the ties of allegiance, but rather a certificate of intimation of the intention to emigrate, and that no obstacle stands in the way of the persons concerned giving up their allegiance to the State. This is the present rule of practice in Austria (cf. Vesque v. Püttlingen, p. 110).

On the other hand, the release is in Austria treated as ineffectual, if the person concerned does not actually leave Austrian territory, and this is quite sound (cf. v. Püttlingen, p. 112). Men who are under military obligations require in Austria special permission, which, in a legal sense, simply implies a waiver by the State of these obligations; or they may obtain a certificate from the State, that no military duties are exigible from them, it may be on account of bodily infirmity.

The idea of the German law on this point is incorrect, in respect that, although emigration is free to all, it only speaks of the cases in which emigration will not be allowed, without saying that in other cases it cannot be denied, and also in respect that it speaks of release from State obligations. Can a man who is free be said to need a release?

But the provision of § 18, subsec. 1, is absolutely wrong, and leads to peculiar results. "The certificate of release operates a loss of nationality the moment it is delivered."

⁸ For the exercise of political rights in its nature presupposes a permanent relation of dependence on the State, and when a man has brought about his dismissal from the State, he has made a declaration that is inconsistent with this relation. Strictly speaking, one who has been thus dismissed, even although he continues to reside in the country, must, in order to exercise political rights, have this declaration formally recalled. The obligation of the State, then, in some aspects lasts longer than its right; the complete freedom of the individual begins before his right (e.g. the right to be eventually taken back by the State) ends. There is, therefore, a sort of incongruity between right and obligation, and we may say that the obligation of special loyalty ceases sooner than the true kernel of nationality, viz. the right to live in the country. This incongruity, however, is inevitable, for an emigrant must begin by seeking an enduring connection with another State, and in this he might find it an obstacle to be obliged still to retain his loyalty to the State of his birth.

This rule applies only to the case of being released from one of the States of the empire to pass into another, a case in which, by § 16, subsec. 1, the acquisition of nationality in the new State is a condition precedent. Besides, within the empire there is a right of migration without payment of any duty. But the rule does not apply to international relations. Can it be asserted that a man who has got his papers of release can be turned out of the territory of the empire, although, as a matter of fact, he has never left his home, and has not been adopted by any other State?

And what is to be the result if, as is the case according to § 7 of the Royal Saxon municipal statute book, the so-called personal statute is determined by nationality? What personal statute has the person so released in the interim?

The rule, however, has this result, which is quite sound, viz. that, when a man's papers are delivered to him, all special obligations of allegiance which are incumbent only on German subjects are extinguished. The person so released cannot, for instance, if he returns to Germany, be punished there for any crime committed by him abroad, except on a special application for that end made by the foreign authorities, and except in the extraordinary cases mentioned in § 4, No. 1, of the Criminal Code. This was recognised, in reference to the corresponding provisions which used to be law in Prussia, in a judgment of the Supreme Court of 26th March 1865, and in a dissertation of an eminent Prussian jurist approving of this decision (cf. Goltdammer in his Archiv. für Preussisches Staatsrecht, pp. 340 et seq.). He can no more be extradited than he can be banished (Judgment of the Prussian Supreme Court, 3rd February 1854. Goltdammer, Archiv. ii. pp. 252 et seq.), while the last paragraph of § 4 of the Criminal Code may be applied.

There is, however, in the last paragraph of § 18 of the German statute, a certain implied recognition of the principle taken up in the text, that all releases are only operative under certain conditions:—

“The release is inoperative, if the person released does not, within six months from the day on which his papers are delivered, shift his abode out of the empire, or acquire nationality in another State of the empire.”

§ 57. In these questions French legislation is sounder than German. The leading grounds on which the character of a French citizen can be lost, set out in the 17th and following articles of the Code Civil [as amended by the statute of 1889], except the special case of a French woman marrying a foreigner, presuppose that a new nationality has been acquired, or at least that French territory has been quitted.

It may, however, be taken as certain according to German law also, that release from allegiance, as distinguished from a loss of nationality under § 21, by reason of long-continued residence in a foreign country, is looked upon as an act that rests upon the assent of the person who is to be released. Accordingly, the decisive point of time is the delivery of the certificate of release, not the date of its publication; and we might put it even more correctly thus, that it is the date at which that certificate is received. Because the person who has applied for it may always refuse to receive it, and thus for a time, or permanently, make the certificate of no effect.¹⁰

A provision to the following effect would be practically useful, viz. :—

“Every one who wishes to emigrate shall receive, on application, an official attestation to show that there are no obstacles in the way of his being released from his allegiance to the State. Those who are subject to military service, soldiers, etc., can only obtain this attestation provided that, etc.”

Delivery of this attestation has these effects, viz. :—

“(1.) The person named therein shall not exercise any special rights which postulate nationality, until he gives back the attestation, but at the same time

“(2.) He is not to be called upon to perform any duties which postulate his nationality or his residence in the State, or in any community belonging to it.

“The attestation shall fall after the expiration of six months, if the person who has received it has not left the territory with the intention of being permanently absent, or of acquiring a foreign residence.”¹¹

LOSS OF NATIONALITY AS A PENALTY, AS A CONSEQUENCE OF PARTICULAR ACTS.

§ 58. It follows, from the principle that every one must belong to some particular State, that in particular we may cast aside any statutory

¹¹ The German law no doubt also recognises a loss of nationality without the consent of the subject (§§ 20, 21). “Germans, who are resident abroad, may be declared to have lost their nationality by a resolution of the central authority of their native State, if in case of a war, or a threatening of war, they fail to obey an express summons for the whole empire issued by the Bundespraesidium (i.e. at present the Emperor) within the specified period.

“§ 21. Germans, who have left the empire and resided ten years uninterruptedly abroad, lose their nationality thereby. That period will be interrupted by being entered in the register of an Imperial Consulate.” (According, also, to the Imperial German Statute of 4th May 1874, regulating the unauthorised exercise of ecclesiastical offices, clergymen or other servants of religion, who by a judicial sentence have been dismissed from their offices, but who nevertheless assert their right to the same or exercise them, or resist any regulations of the police made to prevent them, may be declared to have forfeited their nationality, and may be expelled from the empire.)

At the end of § 21 it is besides provided: “Germans who have lost their nationality by a ten years’ residence abroad, and forthwith return into the territory of the empire, acquire nationality in that State of the empire in which they settle, by means of a certificate of reception under the hand of the supreme administrative authority, which must be given to them on demand.”

As the reception of the applicant is in this case imperative, if the person concerned desires provision which assigns the loss of citizenship as a punishment, or as a consequence of certain acts which may be described as breaches of loyalty, or felony against one's native country. The French statute book contains provisions of this latter kind, and a peculiar French statute of 1848 punishes slave-dealing with the loss of French nationality.¹² But Cogordan properly (pp. 264 et seq.) declares himself opposed to this principle. The only true course, as Cogordan remarks, is that followed by the law of Russia. The Russian does not lose his nationality, but forfeits all privileges, which the law reserves exclusively for Russians. If the entry into the civil and military service of a foreign State, without special leave obtained, or emigration without leave, is to operate loss of citizenship, while the foreign State does not recognise the act in question as having that effect, the only meaning to be attached to the loss of nationality must be one of the following: First, the individual may be free from all criminal responsibility, for crimes in which nationality is recognised as a condition of the possibility of guilt; second, the individual may lose all the privileges of a citizen, particularly diplomatic protection; third, the individual may, in matters of private law, lose all his so-called personal rights; fourth, the individual may have no right to be taken back into the State, and, in the event of his poverty, to be attended to there. The third result, if personal law is to depend on nationality, is a legal impossibility. The fourth result will, as a matter of fact, generally be an impossibility. The first infers no punishment and no disadvantage, but rather in the long run an advantage for the individual. The second result is thus left as the only true solution which is at the same time capable of securing effect in practice.

it, there is an indirect recognition of the position, that the loss of nationality by this means is not definite.

The principle adopted in the text is the foundation of an agreement concluded at Gotha on 15th July 1851, by a large number of German governments, which, however, except in so far as the kingdom of Bavaria is concerned, has lost its practical significance in consequence of the Imperial statute of 6th June 1870 as to domicile, for the purposes of poor law relief. § 1 provided:

"Each of the contracting governments binds itself to receive back persons (a) who have continued to be its citizens or subjects, and (b) their former citizens or subjects, even although by their own law they have already lost their citizenship, so long as they have not come to belong to any other State by its law."

By an exchange of declarations in similar terms, in 1875, between the governments of the German and the Austrian Empires, the same principles are declared to govern their relations (see Vesque von Püttingen, pp. 122, 123; on agreements by Austria with other States to the same effect, see p. 122). As a matter of fact the German Empire, in spite of the formal provisions of the statute as to nationality, seems to be unable to refuse to receive again persons who have lost their German nationality, but have not as yet acquired any other. See the case reported by Wohlers (Entsch. des Deutschen Heimathsamtes, 17, p. 185). Von Martitz, too (p. 1149; see also p. 792), repeats the rule already laid down by me in my first edition, that all grounds for expatriation have merely a relative effect—i.e. no State can in the long run refuse to receive back citizens who have not at the same time acquired another nationality. See, on this, Bluntschli, Völkerr. § 371 and in the Review, ii. p. 117.

¹² Cogordan very properly enquires, Why should not French nationality be withdrawn from other notorious criminals?

ENTRY INTO THE CIVIL AND PARTICULARLY THE MILITARY SERVICE OF A FOREIGN STATE. ABANDONMENT OF NATIVE COUNTRY.

§ 59. All that has been said about the loss of nationality which takes place by direct operation of law, will of course apply to any special sentence of loss of citizenship that may be pronounced according to § 22 of the German statute, in the case of a German who enters foreign public service without the leave of his government. But, on the other hand, § 23 of the German statute promises too much, when it provides: "If a German serves with a foreign government, with the leave of his own government, his nationality remains German." If the entry into the service of a foreign State has, by the laws of that State, the absolute effect of naturalisation, the German Government will scarcely be able to make good its claim, that the official still remains German. It must, at least, abandon all claims that are inconsistent with the requirements of his duty. To be accurate, therefore, the 23rd paragraph must have this addition made to it, "in so far as the conditions of the appointment, and the law of the foreign State allow." If the entry on the service of a foreign power without special leave were not regarded as a kind of insubordination, which deserves to be threatened with the irrational punishment of the loss of nationality, it would be much more correct to provide to this effect, viz.: "Entry on service with a foreign power suspends the duties of nationality, only if it is made with leave of one's own government. But, in conferring such leave, the rights of nationality may be reserved in so far as this is consistent with the office, and with the laws of the foreign State. With such a reservation is always associated the right of re-demanding nationality, by an express declaration to be made in the event of return."¹³

But if we put aside the absurd rule that, by entering a foreign service, a man loses his nationality, and if we hold that it is only lost in so far as a foreign nationality is acquired, we escape from all the difficult questions that are involved in determining what the nature of the foreign official position must be, to infer loss of citizenship.¹⁴ No one would lose his nationality, unless by accepting his office he acquired another.

Again, it is inconsistent with the formal character of nationality, to attach the loss of it to the case where a man simply leaves the country without intending to return,¹⁵ or, it may be, with a positive intention of not returning. A principle of that kind leads back again to all the doubts and vagueness of domicile.¹⁶ One is most inclined to associate loss of citizenship with entry into foreign military service without leave obtained. It is here that the sharpest conflicts may take place, and it seems almost a kindness to the individual, that he should be released in such a case from the burden of his original nationality. French jurisprudence, however, which has at command in this matter a rich store of experience, has recognised that it is not every kind of enlistment in foreign military service that will infer the loss of French nationality, in spite of the very categorical provisions of the 17th article of the statute of 1889, viz.: "Perdent la qualité de Français. . . . Le Français qui sans autorisation du gouvernement . . . prend du service militaire à l'étranger." The performance of military duty in another State is very properly not regarded as involving the loss of French nationality, if the Frenchman has been claimed by that State as liable to serve.¹⁷ It is very easy for officials, or even for the man himself, to make a mistake in such matters; and should we threaten loss of nationality as a penalty for some one else's mistake, or for reluctance to encounter the difficulties of an appeal against it? What is required, then, in France, if French nationality is to be lost, is, first, enlistment in a foreign service for a fixed period (durée déterminée), and, secondly, unequivocal consent to surrender French nationality.¹⁸ Thus in the end the will of the individual comes to be the true determinant, and that is a thing that may very well be open to doubt.

¹⁵ Code Civil, art. 17, La qualité de Français se perdra . . . 3º par toute établissement fait en pays étranger, sans esprit de retour. [Repealed by statute in 1889.]

By losing his nationality, the individual no doubt acquires this advantage, that he cannot be punished for treason, if he bears arms against his ¹⁶ In art. 11 of the Italian statute book, and in the new law of 1889 as to French nationality, this ground for the loss of nationality has disappeared (cf. Weiss, pp. 300 et seq.). It has also disappeared from other systems, which in other respects are very much under the influence of French jurisprudence. No doubt in Austria, § 1 of the charter of emigration, of 24th March 1832, regulates the law by which emigration, with the intention of not returning, destroys Austrian citizenship. Cf. Vesque v. Püttlingen, p. 112.

¹⁷ Cf. judgment of the Trib. at Evreux of 17th August 1881 (Jour. ix. p. 196; Trib. civ. Charleville, Jour. iv. p. 427), and other judgments cited there; Trib. of the Seine, 19th July 1884, Jour. xii. pp. 92 et seq. (Clunet is in agreement with this). See Folleville, pp. 390 et seq., on enlistment in the army of a pretender, or a foreign free corps: he is not inclined to think that this involves loss of French nationality. Cf. p. 395 on the question of the Frenchman who enlisted in the Zouaves under Pope Pius IX., a question much discussed at the time. Clunet (Jour. vi. p. 540) has collected the rules that are in force in France with reference to permission to enlist in foreign service. [These decisions and rules would seem to be still applicable, although the ruling statute is now that which is quoted supra in the text.] A Franco-Spanish treaty of 7th January 1862, art. 5, has gone the length of providing that Spanish subjects, who are born in France, are to be liable to serve as substitutes in France, if they cannot show that they have satisfied the Spanish recruiting law. Generally speaking, several States, in order to lay a burden on evasions of military service, have adopted thorough-going measures of this kind, which must be said to be utterly inadmissible, if the fact of enlistment in a foreign military service must necessarily per se involve the loss of nationality.

¹⁸ See, as to the rules of jurisprudence established in this sense, Jour. v. p. 505.

original country, that all obligations to military service, which have not yet emerged, come to an end, and that the prescription of those delicts, which are committed anew every moment in respect of failure to fulfil duties to his country, begins to run. Prescription of those delicts, it is plain, cannot begin so long as his nationality lasts. But no punishment for treason can be justified, if the person was in ignorance of his own national character, or if compulsion were put upon him by a foreign power, from which he could not well withdraw himself, and the matter of prescription which we have mentioned rests upon nothing better than a very debatable theory of criminal law. The ipso jure expatriation by entry into foreign military service is thus not well founded in the circumstances. It is frequently a not very intelligible favour shown to soldiers against their own country; frequently, in cases where a person who has thus left his own country is forbidden to return,¹⁹ it is a harsh regulation, which stands on no good ground. German jurisprudence knows nothing of this ipso jure expatriation either.

F. FREEDOM OF EXPATRIATION OR EMIGRATION.

I. HISTORICALLY CONSIDERED. THE PRINCIPLE.

§ 60. If, in accordance with what we have already said, it is an inevitable rule of international law that one nationality cannot be fully extinguished until another is acquired, on the other hand it has become more and more the principle of civilised States to hold that individuals are entitled to emigrate and to acquire another nationality.¹ Ancient Rome

¹⁹ Cf. Code Civil, art. 21 [as amended by the statute of 1889]. The 17th article (quoted on the last page) at its close says, "sans préjudice des lois pénales contre le Français qui se soustrait aux obligations de la loi militaire." Codice civ. regno d'Italia, art. 12: "La perdita della cittadinanza nei casi espressi nel articolo precedente non esime dagli obblighi del servizio militare né dalle pene inflitti a chi porti le armi contro la patria."

¹ V. Martitz proposes to distinguish strictly between emigration and expatriation in this sense, that emigration is to be taken to mean departure from one's country without a definite intention of returning, while expatriation describes the forfeiture of nationality. But such a distinction is not in accordance with the ordinary meaning of the words (Auswanderung and Expatriation). Emigration is the actual dissolution of nationality by giving up the existing domicile in the native country; whether the result of that is that the connection with the State which has hitherto subsisted is dissolved, remains undetermined. Stoerk, in v. Holtzendorff's Völkerr. ii. § 116, sides with Martitz, drawing a still more exact distinction between, on the one hand, actual emigration and legal expatriation or loss of citizenship, and, on the other, actual immigration and the reception as a citizen, or naturalisation, by a legal adoption into the other State. But this scheme cannot be maintained intact if, like Stoerk, we hold that expatriation occurs only in the case where at the same time there is a process of naturalisation elsewhere. For in that case expatriation, or loss of citizenship, and naturalisation are simply different sides of the same thing.

If Stoerk's division is to be taken as a fundamental doctrine, a more exact distinction must be drawn, thus:—First, Emigration=an actual permanent departure from the country, with the intention, either existing from the first or afterwards introduced, not to return again permanently=an actual departure from the country, coupled with an abandonment of residence proceeded on a similar theory: nemo in civitate maneat invitus; ² indeed, in the later days of the Republic, it allowed criminal justice to be satisfied by a voluntary exile before sentence was pronounced. On the contrary, in the later Middle Ages, the great mass of the population almost everywhere consisted of persons who were not free, but Glebae ascripti, and such persons obviously could not emigrate without the permission of their overlord. This right of forbidding emigration, or of associating it with oppressive conditions, particularly with the exaction of a heavy tax (Gabella emigrationis), was afterwards transferred to the prince and sovereign of the country. To emigrate without leave seemed a determined act of disloyalty, and all the more so when politico-economical theories subsequently laid special weight upon the numbers of the population of any country. Men spoke of "the indissoluble ties of birth, which bound natural born subjects to their prince and their country;" in this fashion Lewis xiv., in an edict of 1669, threatened those who should emigrate without leave with confiscation of their property, and those who should enter foreign service as shipwrights with death.³ In 1784, the Austrian charter of emigration threatened confiscation of property, along with the loss of all rights of citizenship and a loss of freedom, to any persons who should assist another to emigrate without leave.⁴ English jurisprudence recognised the rule, there. Secondly, Expatriation, or loss of citizenship=fulfilment of the conditions under which the State, on the one hand, will withdraw all claims competent to it on the ground of the connection that has hitherto subsisted, and, on the other hand, its protective supervision founded on that connection. Thirdly, Immigration=actual permanent settling in another country, with the intention of remaining there actually existing from the first, or afterwards introduced=actual transportation of domicile into another country. Fourthly, Reception as a citizen=a legal adoption into a new connection with another State.

Emigration and immigration will as a rule correspond to each other, but not absolutely necessarily so. A man may, just as he can be without a domicile, emigrate from one country without becoming an immigrant in any other. To make expatriation and naturalisation correspond must be an object for which legislation and treaties should labour as much as they can, but to which they can hardly fully attain for a long time, so various are men's conceptions of the minimum of individual freedom, and so various are the claims of States upon the individual. The mischievous influence of treating expatriation and naturalisation, and emigration and immigration as correlative, is seen in Stoerk's case, in the opposition which he urges now and again against the principle of freedom of emigration, and particularly in this, that in the case of the transgression of the rules of expatriation he does not distinguish properly between the position of the State that is left and that of the State to which the person resorts, and that of third States, as the case may be. It is not correct to say that, if one defends on principle the freedom of emigration, "that child of a literature that is ruled by legal ideas rested on the laws of nature and reason" (p. 619), one must logically measure the freedom of immigration by the same standard. For, as there are not merely two States in existence, but a large number with very various systems, so, to hold a man bound to any one country is a much more violent limitation of freedom than to refuse to admit him on his arriving at a new country. We shall discuss more than once again the distinction between the position of the State of the emigration and that of the State of the immigration, or of all other States, as the case may be.

² Cicero pro Balbo, c. 13 (§ 31): "Ne quis invitum civitate mutetur, neve in civitate maneat invitus. Haec sunt enim fundamenta firmissima nostrae libertatis, sui quemque juris et retinendi et dimittendi esse dominum."

³ Cf. Laurent, iii. p. 225, § 128. It was necessary, in the recess of the empire in 1555, to provide expressly (§ 24) for the freedom of emigration of those who were of a different faith.

⁴ Cf. Vesque v. Püttlingen, p. 108.

"once a subject, always a subject" ("nemo potest exuere patriam"), although it must be admitted that this did not in practice lead to such bad results, since in practice the right of emigration was always recognised.⁵

At the present day,⁶ however, the principle of freedom of emigration⁷ is more and more⁸ considered as a universal principle among civilised States, and as a natural deduction from this principle the rule is recognised that the emigrant who really leaves the country cannot be prevented from giving up his former allegiance, and entering another State as its legal subject.⁹

RESTRICTIONS BY REASON OF SPECIAL OBLIGATIONS (MILITARY SERVICE): EFFECT OF THESE IN RELATION TO OTHER STATES.

§ 61. No doubt the native State is entitled to require the emigrant first to fulfil his existing duties to her: this is in particular true of the

⁶ As long ago as the days of Hugo Grotius, freedom of emigration was described by him as a requirement of natural justice.

On the recognition of this rule in Germany, see Alex. Müller, Die Deutschen Auswanderungs-, Freizügigkeits und Heimathsverhältnisse, Leipzig 1841, pp. 6 et seq.; Karminski, pp. 56 et seq. Preuss. Verfassungsurkunde, art. ii. The German Bundesacte specially authorised for subjects of States belonging to the Bund, "free emigration from one State of the Bund to another, which can be shown to be willing to receive them, and also freedom from all taxes on such emigration" (jus detractus, gabella emigrationis).

The United States Congress declared, on 27th July 1868, the right of expatriation to be a "natural and inherent right of all people, indispensable for the enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" (Wharton, Dig. ii. § 184, p. 405).

The course of legislation in the United States has been peculiar. It is provided, in the statute of 27th July 1868, that all persons naturalised in the United States shall have the same claim to protection as citizens of the Union born in the States, and that apparently even in questions with their country of origin. But we find no recognition of the proposition that a citizen of the States must, by naturalisation in another country, lose his citizenship of the States, and the practice of the courts is included to maintain the opposite rule, which is part of the old common law. See Jour. iv. pp. 388 et seq., v. Martitz, pp. 812 et seq. and the materials in Beach-Lawrence, iii. pp. 227 et seq.

It is doubtful whether Russians, except those who have become Russians by naturalisation, can emigrate and acquire another nationality; apparently in the present state of the law they cannot. But a Russian woman, who marries a foreigner, becomes herself a foreigner. Cf. v. Martens, Völkerr. p. 178, Weiss, p. 258.

obligation to military service. But, as Bluntschli (Rev. ii. p. 116) has rightly insisted, in such obligations a certain limit must be observed, unless the freedom of emigration is to be again made illusory.¹

In the first place, the limitation of the liberty of emigration in this way is a matter for the legislation of the home State. No other State would have any right to protest against such limitations, set up by one State for its own subjects. But, on the other hand, apart from special treaties, such limitations have no operation beyond their own territory.² In the days of the old-fashioned prohibitions against emigration, no one in a foreign country thought of them, and often enticed emigrants by special inducements. In the same way, no one can assert that a State may only receive as its citizens those who have severed their connection with their home State in a regular way, i.e. in accordance with the law of that State.³ It is a rule that has often been laid down by the State department of the United States, that, as a matter of principle, naturalisation there cannot be made to depend on any consent of the home State, or on any release from the State connections that have hitherto existed (cf. Wharton, Dig. ii. § 172, § 193, p. 476). By undertaking any such duty a State would put itself in the position of making itself the instrument to execute the most far-reaching and possibly unjust regulations; and, if this principle were generally adopted, freedom of emigration itself would be put in peril.

But, on the other hand, the home State cannot be prevented from giving effect to its restrictive regulations, so far as that can be done without overstepping the restraints of public law. Thus, for instance, in the case of a man who has emigrated in disregard of his obligation to military service,⁴ it may, if it finds him again in its power, compel him to fill up the measure of his service, and punish him for his unauthorised emigration.^{5 6}

² Stoerk, in v. Holtzendorff's Völkerr. ii. pp. 628-630 (cf., too, p. 619), proposes as a matter of principle to allow no one to pass into a new State, except in accordance with the laws of the State to which he has hitherto belonged, and thus in a case of conflict he will regard the status of the individual which is the older in date as the stronger.

We must, however, never forget that freedom of emigration is the principle, and that provisions for securing the performance of the public duties of the citizen are only limitations of that principle, and must, therefore, not be strained into a negation of it. That is to say, we must hold that in questions of private law the unauthorised emigrant has become the citizen of a foreign State, and we can require of him merely the fulfilment of his public duties to his native State. The neglect of mere formalities, e.g. omission to obtain a certificate of release, should in reason, if another nationality has been acquired according to the laws of another State, be regarded even by the home State not as a ground for denying the validity of the naturalisation, but merely as a ground for imposing a disciplinary penalty. In addition, the want of a formal release, or the neglect to make to the home State a formal intimation of retirement must, until nationality in the new State is worked out, necessarily have this disadvantage for the emigrant, that the special duties of loyalty as from a citizen, and other duties also which affect subjects only, e.g. obligations to military service, continue.

There is thus always a strong inducement for the emigrant to make a formal and authentic declaration of his intention to emigrate, and it is desirable in the interests of good order generally that such a declaration should be made. To hold that it may be inferred from the intention of the emigrant, or more correctly, from the want of any intention to return, as French law at the present time infers, is far from practical. Until naturalisation in the foreign country has taken place, it is difficult to prove the want of any such intention, and in many cases the individual himself has not made up his mind. The law of England, which of all systems of the present day guarantees the greatest freedom of expatriation, requires no permission to be obtained, although it always requires a formal authentic declaration.

⁵ On the other hand, the State Department of the United States is unable to afford protection to persons naturalised there, except by friendly representations. But in the territory of any other State the protection is absolute.

⁶ Even in the 5th article of the law for the acquisition and the loss of right of citizenship in Switzerland it is provided: "Persons who, besides Swiss citizenship, possess some other, have in questions with this State, so long as they reside there, no claims for the rights or for the protection that belongs to a Swiss citizen. (Muheim, p. 48, thinks that this provision is exceptional.)"

2. NATURALISATION AS A GROUND FOR THE LOSS OF A PREVIOUS NATIONALITY.

§ 62. Freedom of emigration naturally tends to give as wide a recognition as possible to the rule, which French legislation again deserves the credit of having been the first to set forth, and which has acquired for itself recognition in a constantly widening sphere,¹ the rule, namely, that one nationality is lost by the acquisition of another.² We reach the same result, however, by following the principle that, if possible, every individual should be regarded as the subject of one State only and not of several, and should be liable to the claims of that State alone. This last proposition is justified by the fact that in the long run faith can only be completely kept with one State,³ and cannot be so kept with more than one, so soon as conflicts arise between these States, which is a very possible event in the case of independent States. The proposition purely stated is a mere postulate, an object to which systems of legislation should and will gradually approximate: it is not positive law, but has a positive significance to this extent, that in cases of doubt it may be used to interpret existing systems of law.⁴ We must not, however, give too wide an application to the deduction that naturalisation involves the loss of any previous nationality, however correct that proposition may be. It does not mean, and cannot, after what we have explained, be taken to mean that a State

¹ Constitution of 3rd Sept. 1719, art. 6, No. 1. Code Civil, art. 17 [as amended by the statute of 1889: "Perdent la qualité de Français: 1 le Français naturalisé à l'étranger, ou celui qui acquiert sur sa demande la nationalité étrangère par l'effet de la loi."] But this effect is not produced in cases where the person is still subject to military service in France, unless the French Government allows it.]

² Cf. statute book of the Netherlands, art. 9; Codice civ. Italiano, art. 11; Bayr. Verfassungsurkunde, Beil. i. § 6, No. 1. (According, however, to the provisions of this last, the possibility of enjoying another citizenship along with that of Bavaria, under special Royal licence, is recognised.) The rule is recognised in Spain, Portugal, Turkey, Greece, Brazil, and Bulgaria (cf. Weiss, p. 270, and the illustrations in v. Martitz, p. 811). (V. Martitz also admits that the future belongs to this principle.) In fact, we may add Cisleithanian Austria to this list, as, according to the charter of 24th March 1832, those persons are to be regarded as emigrants who leave the Imperial dominions with the intention of not returning to them. The intention of not returning is most unequivocally announced by obtaining naturalisation in another country. Cf. Vesque v. Püttlingen, p. 112. There are no doubt systems of law which are to this extent illogical, that they forbid one naturalised in another country from bearing arms against the country of his origin, or even (Codice civ. Italiano) leave the obligation to military service still subsisting, although all the ties that bound the citizen are dissolved. What is to happen if the person so naturalised in a new country, perhaps according to the very forms which are recognised by his home State, is compelled by that new country to take up arms, it may be against his home State? That is an absurdity that must be rejected.

³ Cicero pro Balbo, c. 12 (§ 29): "Sed nos Romani non possumus et hujus civitatis esse et cujusvis praterca."

is bound to recognise as an expatriation from itself any naturalisation of its citizens by another State, however that may have been effected.⁵ It cannot involve the recognition of a naturalisation which only exists on paper, or of one that has taken place against the will of the person concerned, and in which even the tacit assent of the person naturalised was not required: nor again of one that has been carried out so hurriedly, and with such disregard of the existing obligations of the individual, that it necessarily wears the appearance of imperilling all permanent relations of loyalty due to the State of origin. The meaning of the proposition rather is, in questions with the home State, merely that naturalisation in another State takes the place of the formalities of a release from the ties of the original nationality, and that, accordingly, no more obligations can arise between the person who has been naturalised and his home State, from the moment that it has taken place. In other words, naturalisation in another State should take the place of a formal declaration by the emigrant of his intention to sever his old ties of citizenship, and also of a formal release by the home State, in so far as that cannot be refused on any substantial grounds.⁶ In so far as the adopting State is concerned,⁷ however, the rule has full operation so far as its territorial power, as defined by public law, extends. (This must all, too, be applicable for instance to consular jurisdiction in Oriental States. The Consul has no longer any jurisdiction over a person who has been naturalised in another State, even although he has not been formally released from his former citizenship: for the jurisdiction of the Consul rests solely upon a concession by the State in which the person lives.)

Finally, we are by no means entitled to say that it is utterly opposed to the principles of public law for a State to adhere strictly to the observance of certain formalities,⁸ which for special reasons it values highly, at the

⁷ What is the result if a person, who has emigrated without obtaining leave, has not yet been fully naturalised, but, with a view to being so, has taken the preliminary steps, and has already got a passport from the authorities of the State in which he intends to be naturalised? (As to the practice of the State Department of the United States in such cases, see Wharton, Dig. ii. § 193.) As the giving of a passport means that the holder is under the diplomatic protection of the State that gave it as known to public law; and as that State, if it seems in abstracto entitled to give naturalisation, can in like manner give this inferior concession, as a partial naturalisation, it follows that, in the territory of a third State, such a passport must have the effect of withdrawing the holder from the consular jurisdiction of his State of origin. In this way the Austrian Consul-General was distinctly in the wrong in the much-discussed case of Koszta at Smyrna, in so far as he had the Hungarian refugee Martin Koszta, who was provided with a passport from the United States, forcibly seized on Ottoman territory, and carried on board an Austrian frigate. See, on this case, Woolsey, Introduction to the Study of International Law, London 1875, § 81; Calvo, ii. § 830; Wharton, Dig. ii. § 175, p. 358.

release or dismissal of its citizens, and to disregard on this ground, within the sphere of its own sovereignty, the naturalisation of one of its own citizens which has taken place in another State, without these formalities being observed. The rule that what is on the one side naturalisation, is on the other expatriation, is a rule which we can only hope for. Accordingly, after consideration of many instances of abuses of the rule, it has been recognised as a principle, which is not at variance with public law, that Turkey will treat the naturalisation of any of her subjects by a foreign power as null and void, if that subject has not obtained the sanction of the Ottoman Government.⁹ It is desirable, as facts testify, to make a prudent use of such propositions of law as are concerned with mere formalities, and to let them give way to circumstances.

THE BANCROFT TREATIES CONCLUDED BY THE UNITED STATES.

§ 63. An application of the leading principle of freedom of emigration is the corner-stone of the treaties which the United States Government concluded, with reference to foreigners naturalised in the United States, with the North German Bund, Bavaria, Baden, Württemberg, Hesse, Austria-Hungary, and lastly with Denmark, between 1868 and 1872.¹⁰ These treaties¹¹ have in many instances been very unfavourably criticised by German authors, especially by Fr. Kapp,¹² and by von Martitz in the treatise to which we have so often referred. In many respects we can only agree with this criticism. In fact, the European Governments have in those treaties abandoned too much of their well-founded rights, and in particular they have made it possible for persons who have been naturalised in the United States, without having fulfilled their military duties in Europe, to return after a comparatively short time unmolested, and to live, themselves and their descendants, who again are born in Europe, as citizens of the United States, while in truth they are simply Germans or Austrians exempted from military service and many other duties of citizenship. This is, however, not a consequence of the principle we have ⁹ The Swiss citizenship is only lost by express renunciation. Cf. Decision of the Federal Court of 9th Oct. 1886, Jour. xiv. p. 115.

¹¹ On the history of these treaties, see Beach-Lawrence, iii. pp. 245 et seq., and the treatise of Fr. Kapp cited in the next note. Also v. Martitz, as cited.

¹² Preussische Jahrbücher (1875), ed. by H. v. Treitschke, vol. xxxv. pp. 509 et seq. pp. 659 et seq. vol. xxxvi. pp. 189 et seq. This paper gives, too, a complete history of the North German Treaty. See, too, Wesendonck in Hirth's Annalen des Deutschen Reichs, 1877, pp. 205 et seq.

stated, which could not have been shaken even by Kapp's criticism of these treaties,¹³ a criticism which undoubtedly exceeds all reasonable measure, and is one-sided. It is rather a consequence of the fact, that the revival of the original nationality has been made to depend not merely upon a formal and unquestionable fact, but also on the intention of the individual, which is capricious, may very likely be doubtful, and is easily disavowed. This, again, must be taken in connection with the circumstance that the law of the United States, without laying any weight on settled formalities, declares the essential point for the expatriation of citizens, both born and naturalised, to be this intention, which is to be inferred from circumstances, e.g. from the circumstance that the person concerned has spent a very long time abroad, without paying taxes in the United States, or has taken his whole property away with him, etc.¹⁴ It would certainly give rise to very great inconveniences in the intercourse of Germany and the United States, if a two years' residence in Germany should be taken absolutely as a proof of a renunciation of the rights of an American citizen.¹⁵ That mistake¹⁶ has, for example, been avoided by the English statute. To that subject we shall again return. Those evils have, however, by unfortunate expression in the treaties, been enhanced in an important particular.

These treaties, then, stand in need of amendment. It would be an important, although indirect, improvement in their operation if the amendment of German law which we have already indicated were carried out. The general direction, however, in which these treaties moved, in so far as the leading principle—the extinction of a subsisting nationality by the acquisition of a new one—was concerned, deserves approval. The other principle contained in these treaties, that the claim of the original

¹⁴ Cf. Wharton, Dig. ii. § 176. In this way we should assume more easily that expatriation had taken place, when the persons had returned to their State of origin, than we should in the case of a more prolonged stay in the territory of another State. As citizens of the Union are not bound to military service in times of peace, while it is the law of the domicile which furnishes, according to their jurisprudence, the rule for personal rights, the only importance which the question really has for the Union is in relation to the diplomatic protection which it is to give to the persons in question. Up to the time of the Bancroft treaties, that question had been treated with an arbitrary discretion. Such protection was not accorded absolutely, for instance, to a person who for a long time had not troubled himself about the country to which he claimed to belong, although his character as an American citizen was not disputed by any one.

¹⁶ On the other hand, the German legal system suffers, just as the Prussian system did before it, from the mistake by which, in the case of naturalisation in a foreign country, effected by a formal declaration, the validity of the expatriation is made to depend on the formality of the previous release from the ties of an earlier nationality, except in the case of a ten years' residence in the foreign country. Whereas the omission of this formality, although on military grounds it is a thing to be observed, should only involve a police penalty and the disadvantage to the emigrant, that the burden of proving his intention to emigrate, and the length of his residence abroad, would rest on him. It might happen, for instance, that persons unlearned in the law, who had emigrated without truly doing any violence to their

State for fulfilment of military duty shall be extinguished by a residence for a certain prolonged term in another country, is also proper and practical. This is a principle, it seems, which is to be traced to an idea started in 1865, by the Minister President Count Bismarck (cf. Kapp, 35, p. 678).

G. NATURALISATION.

1. DEFINITION.

§ 64. There are various ways in which a foreigner may be adopted in a State. Of what description must this adoption be, to be held to be such a naturalisation as will destroy a subsisting nationality?

obligation for military service, and on whom as individuals no blame rested,—persons, it might be, who at an early age had emigrated with their father, who had omitted to preserve a permission for them,—might suddenly, on the occasion of some visit to Prussia after a long time, be arrested and compelled by force to serve in the army.

According to the existing law that was quite correct, but it was not very convenient or just, if for the moment we put positive law out of sight. In international law, an appeal to an existing positive law is decisive for the past and for the present, but not for the future, and thus the Prussian diplomatists had a part to play which must inevitably end in concessions, and did not deserve the violent abuse with which Kapp so profusely covered them. On the other hand, the diplomatists of the United States took their stand in a position which legally they could not maintain, by asserting directly the operation of naturalisation in the United States, even in the territory of the home State of the person who had been naturalised. Besides, this agreement was rendered more difficult because the Prussians felt that an obstacle to emigration was implied by the attainment of the age for military service (i.e. the end of the 17th year), while the negotiators on the other side had no idea that there could be any impediment in the way of emigration short of an actual summons to satisfy a public duty. As a matter of form, the United States must have made the corresponding concession that citizenship of the United States should be extinguished by the acquisition of North German citizenship and a stay of five years in that territory. But this concession was practically of no importance, because there is no immigration from the United States worth mentioning, and because the Union knows nothing of a general obligation to military service, but has merely proclaimed it as a temporary measure at times. If the whole matter was to be settled to the satisfaction of both sides, it was necessary to renounce the right of inflicting punishment upon persons whose military service was to be dispensed with, because they were to be regarded as citizens of the United States. It is rather an extreme measure, and one that by many nations would be regarded as unmerciful, to lay down that emigration in disregard of the obligation to enter military service is to be regarded, in accordance with § 140, subsec. 1 of the German Criminal Code, as a continuing crime, the prescription of which will not begin to run until the whole period of military service has expired. Hence the apparently peculiar provision of article 2, which certainly is so expressed as almost to convey the impression that the North German Confederation had now for the first time to affirm a right, which obviously belonged to it, and a right that could never have been touched by any questions of emigration and expatriation, viz. a right to inflict punishment for criminal acts committed on its own territory before emigration. Such an interpretation would also withdraw from the jurisdiction of the German Courts a naturalised American who, during his stay in North America, should have coined German money and forged German notes. (The provisions of the Austrian treaty are much more correct, although they too only protest the obligation to military service to a very moderate extent, cf. Vesque v. Pittlingen, p. 118.) It is no doubt true that naturalisation and long residence in a foreign country should never in reason be a ground for remitting a punishment which has been incurred. But if it was undesirable to alter the fundamental provisions of the criminal law, and by so doing to concede something all round, which, as matters stand, has only been conceded to American citizens, the procedure inevitably fell into

It is certainly not enough that a full legal capacity, equal to that of the State's own subjects, should be accorded.¹ Still less that mere honorary distinctions or grants of nobility should be conferred and accepted.² Honorary citizenships, etc., and even appointment to a public or State office, need not necessarily involve naturalisation, although this may be the case, as for example it is under § 9 of the German Imperial Statute.³ No doubt the devotion and loyalty, which are as a rule required of the holders of public offices, recommend the course of associating naturalisation with the holding of such offices in general.^{4 5} But we cannot ask that naturalisation, in some such lines, which, as a matter of form, are incorrect. On the other hand, there is no doubt that art. 4 contains a real mistake.

"If a German naturalised in America renews his residence in North Germany, without the intent to return to America, he shall be held to have renounced his naturalisation in the United States."

"Reciprocally, if an American naturalised in North Germany renews his residence in the United States, without the intent to return to North Germany, he shall be held to have renounced his naturalisation in North Germany."

"The intent not to return may be held to exist when the person naturalised in the one country resides more than two years in the other country."

The word "may" in this last paragraph has justly been found fault with. It has been said that it was by surprising the German diplomatists that the word "shall," which was the word used in the original draft of the treaty, had to give place to the word "may." It is true that a man, who has been naturalised in the United States, if he returns to North Germany and takes up his residence there permanently, can pretty easily exclude the simple statutory presumption contained in the word "may," by formal declaration taken before any United States Embassy; and he can also exclude it by taking up a shifting residence, now in North and now in South Germany. Indeed, in the Bavarian treaty, this meaning has through the relative protocol been attached to article 4, viz. that the home-State cannot prevent the returning emigrant from again acquiring Bavarian nationality; while in the treaty with Baden this meaning is given to article 4, that the returning emigrant will not be forced to re-acquire nationality in Baden. The interpretation of article 4 in North Germany seems practically to lead to the same result as that which follows from the treaty with Baden, for, as v. Martitz notices, the returned emigrant only becomes German by being adopted anew by the State, and this adoption cannot well be forced upon him. (Cf. Kapp, ut cit. 36, pp. 221 et seq. v. Martitz, p. 1123.) Wesendonck, ut cit. p. 208, proposes to alter the fourth article to this effect, viz.: "Expatriated Germans shall not be entitled to this treatment" (i.e. as citizens of the United States), if they have resided more than two years in German territory without permission from the German Government. "The beginning and end of this period shall be fixed by notices which the German Empire may within a period of at least two years serve upon the persons concerned." The idea at the bottom of this proposal seems to be sound.

² Cf. judgment of the Court of Ghent, 8th March 1882 (Rev. xvi. p. 140), Férand Giraud (Jour. xii. p. 228). The gift of Austrian nobility does not give rise to Austrian citizenship. Karminski, 13.

³ It may be doubted whether it is more desirable to hold that naturalisation takes place ipso jure when a public office is assumed, or, as a preliminary, to give the officer naturalisation. The former rule, logical in itself, would have this practical disadvantage, that one will sometimes be uncertain whether the function that has been assumed is in the sense of the rule a public office.

⁴ In relation to service as an officer, the remark in the text is not undisputed in the German Empire. Cf. Laband Staatsr. d. Deutschen Reichs, 2nd ed. i. p. 162. In Austria, by art. iii. of the Constitution, entry on an official office is made dependent on a previous acquisition of Austrian nationality. Cf. Vesque v. Püttingen, § 92, p. 87, Karminski, p. 29.

⁵ Even the right of voting on certain political occasions (and, of course, the actual exercise order that it may secure these objects, should carry with it full political rights.^{6 7} All that needs to be given is a real and, at the same time, an irrevocable right of residence.^{8 9}

On the other hand, the extent of the territory over which the naturalisation is operative, must be immaterial, as also must be the question whether the naturalisation which has been obtained in a colony is good for it only, or is also good for the country upon which that colony is dependent.¹⁰

2. REQUIREMENTS. CONSENT AND CAPACITY OF THE PERSON.

§ 65. Since, however, the effect of naturalisation, in doing away with an existing nationality, is merely a deduction from the principle of freedom of emigration, the recognition of this effect will be refused, certainly by the State of origin, and probably also by other States, if the naturalisation is against the will of the person concerned,¹ or has taken place without the possibility of their being any presumption² that it has taken place with his consent.³

of that right) cannot absolutely be considered as involving the acquisition of nationality (Wharton, ii. § 173, p. 343). Cf. Karminski, pp. 11 et seq. p. 17. Judgment of the Court of Ghent, 1st February 1877 (Dubois, Rev. xiii. p. 61): "The exercise of the purely elective and gratuitous functions of a municipal councillor does not involve naturalisation."

⁶ Thus a Frenchman becomes a Norwegian or Danish citizen, as the case may be, by a two years' domicile in Norway or Denmark, although he acquires no political rights by virtue of this domicile. So Cogordan, pp. 197, 198.

⁹ Domicile authorised by Government in France gives no such right. In spite of that authorisation, a foreigner can be expelled.

¹⁰ The English colonies grant naturalisation, but this has effect only within the territory of the colony concerned. Cf. Foote, p. 7.

¹ On this ground any arrangement such as that which existed in Mexico for a time, by which all persons who were not registered with the Mexican Government as foreigners, were simply treated as Mexican subjects till they were registered, must be regarded as contrary to public law. See the negotiations of the United States' States Department as to this "Mexican immatriculation," in Wharton, Dig. ii. § 172*a*. The Government of the United States rightly insisted that the right and the duty of a government to protect its citizens in a foreign country could not in this way be made to depend upon the municipal law of that foreign country.

But, since a real assent is requisite, a person who desires to be naturalised in another State must be capable of declaring his assent, so as to bind himself. The question is, by what law this capacity is to be determined: must it exist by the law of the State that receives him, or by that of his home State, or must the legal systems of both countries recognise it?

The true answer seems to be that this capacity is to be held to exist, if the law of the home State recognises it. If we were to assume that legal capacity is merely the determination of the natural capacity which is conditioned by birth and climate, this proposition would need no further proof. We shall, however, be led to the same conclusion by considering that the home State will hardly be inclined to recognise the naturalisation in another country, of a person who is by its own law incapable of consent, and that, in questions of nationality, conflicts of legal systems are to be avoided as far as may be. The German statute, § 8, is thus expressed:—

“A certificate of naturalisation can be given to foreigners only if they, first, are of legal capacity by the law of the country that has up to that time been their home, provided that their want of capacity be supplemented by the concurrence of the father, guardian, or curator of the persons who are to be naturalised.⁴

might not have been formally naturalised. (On that, see Wharton, Dig. ii. § 202.) A claim of that kind cannot be maintained with such strictness on the principles of public law. In many States foreigners, who are resident in the country, are allowed to vote; again, in such matters it not unfrequently happens that a man may vote under error, or, again, a man may not give any serious consideration to the matter. Thus we do not find the requisite definite declaration of an intention to be naturalised in the fact that a man has taken part in an election, a privilege which is as a rule only allowed to citizens. At least we can only do so, if the legislature has declared antecedently that it will hold that to take part in such elections is a proof of such intention. If, under the pressure of necessity, the sovereign authority of a country, in which very many persons of doubtful nationality reside, takes a step of this sort, a reasonable time must be allowed to these persons to make it clear, by removing themselves from the country, that they do not desire to become its subjects. In the end this principle has been the rule of procedure in all cases in which an appeal has been taken against enrolment in the army, even in the United States. See Bluntschli, § 391, and the despatch of Lord Lyons cited by him, dated 29th November 1862.

⁴ Laurent, iii. § 110, in reference to art. 9 of the Code Civil, is to the same effect. That article allowed the child of a foreigner born in Belgium or France, as the case may be, to claim French or Belgian nationality on attaining majority. Cf., too, Folleville, p. 313. The rule of Swiss law is peculiar. According to article 6 it requires for the Swiss, who desires to renounce his nationality, no more than that he shall have legal capacity by the law of his new home; while, on the other hand, according to art. 2, subsec. 1, the Federal Council will not grant authority for the adoption of a foreigner as a citizen of a canton, if any prejudice or difficulties are likely to arise with the home State of the person so adopted, in respect of the adoption. But such disadvantages or conflicts will be very apt to arise, if, by the law of the home State, the person concerned has not legal capacity. The principle of article 6 of the Swiss law is that of the greatest possible freedom of emigration. In the abstract it goes too far, and its existence in the law is explained by the fact that, in the legal systems of particular cantons, there are to be found too close restrictions of the freedom of intercourse, which are in this thorough fashion deprived of all power of doing harm. See judgment of the Federal Court, of 5th April 1878 (Jour. vi. p. 95), on the application of article 6 to the case of one who has been placed under curatory in Switzerland on account of his prodigality, and who subsequently is naturalised in the United States.

But it would be unreasonable to require legal capacity according to the law of the State which receives such a person—if, for instance, it postpones majority to a later age—on this account, because in case of doubt the State to which he belongs by descent will be the best judge as to whether he has acquired the necessary mental and moral maturity.

A question, however, does arise whether, in international intercourse, we must have regard to every other incapacity to make a binding and real declaration of intention which may exist according to the law of the home State, as we must have regard to that incapacity which is founded on the immaturity of age.

The familiar instance of slaves proves that this question cannot be answered unconditionally in the affirmative.⁵ No one doubts that a man, who by the law of State A is a slave, becomes free the moment he treads the soil of State B, in which slavery does not exist, and is not recognised. Shall a man, who was a slave in State A, not be capable of being received in State B as one of its citizens, on the ground that, by the laws of A, it was impossible for him to dispose of his own person? This question must, of course, necessarily be answered in the negative, and so we have to lay down that limitations of capacity, which we must regard as contrary to our views of morality, are no impediments to naturalisation in our country.

THE BAUFFREMONT CASE.

§ 66. In this connection we may discuss one of the disputed points which had to be taken into consideration in the famous Bauffremont case.⁶ The Princess Bauffremont, who was by birth a Belgian, and by marriage a Frenchwoman, was separated from her husband, the Prince Bauffremont, from bed and board. Without her husband's consent she became naturalised in Saxe-Altenburg, with the intention of turning the separation by that means into a divorce, and so placing it in her power to contract another marriage. Thereupon she did contract another marriage in Berlin, before the proper official there, with Prince Bibesco, a Roumanian subject. The first question that arises is:⁷ Was the naturalisation in the ⁵ Thus Bluntschli, in the pamphlet cited in the next note.

⁷ In all the other treatises in which the Bauffremont case is discussed, so far as I know, it is attempted to overcome the difficulties which it presents, by propounding a series of German empire valid, and should it in the course of events have been recognised by the French court? On this question depends the validity of the second marriage, which is disputed by Prince Bauffremont, and there also depends on it the answer to the second question, whether, as has been maintained in France, the Princess committed bigamy.

If we assume that a femme séparée de corps according to French law is in a position, even without her husband's assent, to acquire another nationality, there would be no difficulty in answering the first of these questions in the affirmative. But if, in agreement with the majority of French writers,⁸ we deny her that privilege, the first subordinate question arises, viz.: Could a German official, in accordance with § 8 of the German Imperial Statute which we have quoted (p. 157), give her a certificate of naturalisation? The answer to this question again depends on the question whether incapacity, which, according to the statute, will prevent naturalisation being given, includes that impediment which we find in the questions and answering them in turn. Gabba, however, thinks that this is an entirely mistaken course of procedure. According to him, the only relevant question of law, and at the same time the only true question of international law, is: Is it possible for one spouse, in this case the wife, to the prejudice of the rights of the other, and with the result of leaving him still in the bonds of matrimony, to change her status by naturalisation in a foreign State, and attain the privilege of being able to marry again? He answers this question in the negative, because he says that the unity of the idea of the family will not allow this to be done.

In this method of my distinguished colleague, I can see nothing but a mistaken and unlaywer-like course of procedure. It is just by splitting up a complicated case into a series of minor questions, that you can gather light from all sides, and finally determine which rule, among the conflicting rules of different territories, is to be supreme. It was at least possible that such a conflict should arise, since France did not at the time recognise divorce, while the German legal system had begun to reject the perpetual separation from bed and board. As every question of private international law is in the end a question of the applicability of the laws of this or that State, it seems at the same time to be inadmissible, to start at once with the thesis, that a marriage cannot be dissolved for the one spouse, while it continues to subsist for the other. Such a thesis is simply a petitio principii. The question as to which territorial system of law is to apply, cannot depend upon a relation of private law, the recognition or non-recognition of which must depend on the question, What laws are to rule the question? It must rather depend either on a pure fact, e.g. the actual situation of the person or the thing, or upon a circumstance which is not exclusively a relation of private law, such as we undoubtedly find in the circumstance or relation of nationality. Besides, before the Imperial Statute of 1875, it was a matter of common occurrence in Germany, in the case of mixed marriages, that the Protestant spouse was divorced, while the Catholic, in conformity with the ecclesiastical law which he or she recognised, was only separated. That is exactly the relation of Prince Bauffremont to his wife, which Gabba describes as utterly impossible, if the naturalisation, which took place in Germany, and the divorce are regarded as valid.

⁸ See the notices in Teichmann's book, pp. 11 et seq., and Jour. iii. pp. 183 et seq., and judgment of the French Court of Cassation of 18th March 1878 (Jour. v. p. 505). Verger, Des mariages contractés en pays étranger, p. 27, is of opinion that even the husband, in the converse case, could not have obtained a one-sided divorce following upon such a naturalisation. He thinks that, as the concurrence of the wills of both spouses is necessary for contracting a marriage, the same concurrence should be required to subject them to a new law of divorce. I cannot agree with this argument. Marriage implies no contract as to divorce. Bondeau and D. de Folleville in France have declared themselves in favour of the power of the femme séparée to be naturalised in a foreign country. The Swiss jurist Pilicier (p. 292) most recently has declared against it.

marriage that has not been completely dissolved. If we follow the letter of the statute, we shall be inclined to say that it does. But the proviso as to the concurrence of the father, guardian, or curator, and the want of any mention of the husband, makes it improbable that it was intended to include the case of a wife, who by the legal conceptions of many countries has a right to demand complete dissolution of the marriage, and therefore has a good claim to complete independence in the matter of naturalisation. The matter should, in so far as the adopting State is concerned, be rather stated thus: If it does not recognise the doctrine of a permanent separation from bed and board, which was the only doctrine of the kind recognised in France after the statute of 1816 till that of 1884, as a legal doctrine or one that can be enforced in accordance with legal principle (as is undoubtedly the case with Germany according to the statute of the German Empire of 6th February 1876, § 77), if it holds a true divorce to be the only remedy that can be justified on public grounds, it must treat a separation from bed and board as a true divorce,⁹ in respect that any other course would really tend to give effect to the doctrine of separation, which it repudiates. A system which looks upon a true divorce as necessary in cases of a serious transgression of the laws of marriage, may regard such a doctrine as that of a permanent separation from bed and board, which, in any event, rests upon an incomplete conception of that remedy, as one that must be rejected. If the State were to refuse to grant naturalisation because, by the law of another country, a separatio a thoro et mensa was all that had parted the husband and wife, it would, in truth, be doing its best to work out a relation of these two spouses which its own law tells it to reject, just in the same way as if it were to refuse to naturalise a man, because by the law of some other country he was a slave or bondsman.¹⁰

¹⁰ Laurent, v. § 18, refuses to recognise the analogy of the case of a slave; the wife, he says, by her marriage, voluntarily gives herself up to the indissolubility of the marriage tie. But can we not conceive slavery or bondage of some kind founded upon a bargain? Did bondage in the States of Germany not to a great extent rest upon private bargains? Karminski who at pp. 32 et seq. makes a pretty thorough examination of the Bauffremont case, presses the capacity which is required by § 8, subsec. 1 of the German statute, applying this language to the case of the wife as such. On the other hand, he refuses to admit the analogy of the non-recognition of slavery, because the slave is to be regarded as a free citizen, not of our State, in which he now stands, but of the State which he has quitted, and his legal capacity is accordingly to be determined by the laws of that other State. This misses the point. The slave State allows the slave no capacity at all; it is therefore quite impossible to regard the State from which the slave has escaped, as regulating the personal rights of a person whom we regard as free. The State to which the slave escapes must, in any case, from time to time apply its own laws in such cases, as, for instance, it must establish a curatory according to its own law for a slave child who has escaped without its father. Just as fruitless is Karminski's reference to Lammasch's perfectly sound exposition of the extradition of slaves who have committed crimes in the slave State (Auslieferungspflicht und Auslieferungsrecht, 1887, p. 373).

Now, since the principles which are applicable to the so-called coercitive statutes would make it impossible, in the face of the statute of 1875, to require such co-operation from any German State, the Government of Saxe-Altenburg was justified in giving its naturalisation. No doubt it was necessary that the Imperial statute of 1875 should already be in force there, or that the same principle, according to which only a true divorce, and not separation a mensa et thoro, was recognised as permissible, should in some other way be already of authority there. The statute of 1875 was only in operation for the empire from 1st January 1876, while the certificate of naturalisation bore the date of 3rd May 1875. It may no doubt be objected to the conclusion which we have reached, that by such means any State, by its acts of naturalisation, may favour serious evasions of the laws of a neighbouring State, and may possibly, as a consequence, be the means of introducing most mischievous consequences into the family relation. But evils of this kind cannot, in truth, be avoided, either here or in other relations, if naturalisation is to be given without a domicile for some fixed period in the adopting State being required. The German statute rests upon this principle, which is in my judgment erroneous.¹¹ We shall return immediately to this question, when we come to take up the question of naturalisation obtained in fraudem legis.

3. NATURALISATION AN ACT OF SOVEREIGNTY. DEFECTS IN THIS ACT. RIGHT OF THE COURTS TO INQUIRE INTO NATURALISATION. THE BAUFFREMONT CASE AGAIN.

§ 67. If we suppose that the Government of Saxe-Altenburg, in giving naturalisation, acted against the rule of the Imperial statute, this further question then arises: Is a naturalisation, which has been conferred in disregard of some statutory direction, operative all the same, or must it be regarded as non-existent? We may also put this further query: Does it make any difference whether the question as to its validity comes up in that same country or in another, before native or foreign courts?

The first question is primarily a question of domestic law, or of the administrative rules of the particular State. In any case, we can save the validity of the naturalisation for the country in which it has taken place if, with Landgraff,¹ we assert a right of dispensation in the ¹¹ This important point, which in my view applies only de lege ferenda, and not for the decision of the concrete case, has been excellently raised by Gabba (p. 28). But there was no fraudulent act in any legal sense. Gabba, in assuming that there was, forgets the distinction between change of domicile and naturalisation.

¹ Hirth's Annalen, 1876, p. 1024. Laband (Staatsrecht des d. Reichs, i. p. 160, note 3), on the other hand, is of opinion that the governments of the several States in the German Empire have in such a matter no right of dispensation as against a statute of the empire. But, according to the judgment of the Prussian Oberverwaltungs Gericht, of 23rd June 1886, cited by him, an error in fact as to the conditions of naturalisation does not destroy the validity of the naturalisation.

particular case for the State which has performed the act of naturalisation, and at the same time an implied exercise of that right. The operative effect of the naturalisation, in spite of the slip that was made, may be demonstrated in yet another way. We may say, shall every little oversight in the preliminaries of what is an act of administration be a ground for annulling that act? Is the rule not otherwise in judicial proceedings, which are not liable to be annulled for every trifling error in procedure? Must we not in any case, if we are to avoid creating a monstrous uncertainty as to men's rights by treating acts of the administration as null, limit our sentence of nullity, as in the analogous case of the old nullity of judicial sentences, to cases of clear infringements of the law in thesi? Would it not be true to assert that, if the courts in the case in question were for themselves to undertake over again to test all the conditions of naturalisation, which the officials appointed for that purpose should have investigated, there would be an invasion of the domain of the administrative government, which would, if conceived as an application of a general principle, and applied in other cases, necessarily produce a confusion of legal ideas?^{2 3} Might it not in particular be asserted that, supposing the German law to direct its officials to refuse naturalisation, unless some particular requirement were satisfied in the eye of the foreign law as well as in that of its own, this refusal should only be given in case the foreign law were fixed beyond all doubt? Into what remote discussions might the subject not run, and frequently to the great disadvantage of the persons concerned, if it was necessary to have absolute certainty as to every single doubtful question of foreign law! May we not say with some reason: In doubt the officials are to proceed simply according to their own law; and they are to presume in cases of doubt, in which their own law offers no obstacle, that there is no obstacle known to the foreign law either?⁴

Seydel⁵ assumes quite broadly that naturalisation, conferred in spite of the failure of some condition required by law, is not null, because the law does not pronounce that any such result must follow, and there is no procedure known by which a sentence of nullity could be pronounced.

³ In the United States, naturalisation is given after a causæ cognitio by the courts of record appointed for that purpose, and by means of a formal judgment. We suppose that a judgment of that kind could only be quarrelled in case of an intentional deceit practised on the court, provided always that the court was vested with the proper jurisdiction. In the case of treachery of such a kind, the foreign office will not extend the protection accorded to an American citizen to the person using it. Cf. Wharton, Dig. ii. § 174 and app. to § 174.

All these questions, however, are, as we have said, mere questions of the domestic law of the State and its administration.⁶ It is, however, a question of international law whether the courts of another State, in particular those of the home State, can declare this naturalisation to be null,⁷ on the ground either that the law of the adopting State has been transgressed, or that the conditions required by the laws of the home State for expatriation have not been satisfied.

It is plain that no court can directly, i.e. in the operative part of their judgment, declare a foreign naturalisation null, and to that extent those who assert that naturalisation, as the act of a foreign sovereign, is withdrawn from the jurisdiction of our courts, are right. In truth, the courts of State A can never with direct effect determine that a naturalisation shall have none of its proper effects, even in the territory of State B, which gave the decree of naturalisation. A decree to that effect would undoubtedly be an invasion of the sphere of a foreign sovereignty. But the courts of State A are hardly likely to be directly called upon to declare the naturalisation given by State B to be null.

The decision which they will be asked to pronounce will be of quite another kind;⁸ such, for instance, as the decision asked in the Bauffremont case, whether the wife, who had been naturalised, and in consequence had become a divorced woman, or must be regarded as one, still had distinct duties towards her husband, who had remained in the home State, and whether the marriage with him still had a legal existence. In questions such as these the foreign naturalisation affords a ground of decision, in the shape of a preliminary plea, and there can be no doubt that the courts must decide upon it. The case here is precisely the same as it is in the German common law, and in the law of France,⁹ in the case of judicial decisions as to acts of the administrative powers of their own country. The courts have no power directly to annul any determination of the administrative powers which they hold invalid; but they refuse to recognise such an act, in so far as it is made the foundation of the existence or non-existence of a right, which is claimed or disputed in the courts. This power, too, the courts have, not merely in cases where the foreign officials have given naturalisation in disregard of their own law, even when that law has been observed; but the native law declares the expatriation inoperative, it is the right and the duty of our courts to treat the naturalisation which has taken place abroad as inoperative within the sphere of sovereignty that belongs to our State.¹⁰ It may be that in so doing our courts are following a mistaken principle, which is at variance with international law, but courts must always adopt the theory which the legislative authority of their country takes as its guide. There can, of course, be no doubt that this may give rise to regrettable conflicts of law. A man may, in accordance with these rules, be regarded by the courts and officials of State A as a citizen of that State, and at the same time by the courts of B as a subject of State B, and both may make claims upon him. In a word, we have to deal with the effect of a foreign naturalisation as a means of expatriation, and we have already noticed (p. 151) that this effect cannot be recognised to the full without some limitation. The opposite theory would result in our having to recognise fully in our own country the most arbitrary laws of naturalisation of a foreign State: and to appeal to the fact that we are there dealing with an act of sovereignty of that foreign State proves simply nothing, for this reason, because, although judicial sentences passed in name of the sovereign

¹⁰ A judgment of the German Imperial Court (Strafsenat i.) of 2nd June 1881 agrees with this view (Entsch. in Strafsachen, iv. pp. 271 et seq.). Opinions of the Imperial Court in Criminal Affairs, iii. pp. 362 et seq.). See, too, Gabba, p. 27, Gerbaut, No. 397, Cogordan, p. 278. "C'est à la France . . . qu'il appartient à décider si un individu a perdu ou non la qualité de Français." Cogordan is, however, wrong in adding, "C'est à la France seulement à décider si un individu a perdu ou non la qualité de Français;" he is also wrong in describing that as an inadmissible doctrine of law, in obedience to which the Belgian courts, and especially the Court of Cassation, have often decided that a person has lost French nationality. If this point came up for decision as a preliminary point in a suit which was competently laid before the Belgian Court, then the decision was perfectly right. Apart from the special provisions of an international treaty, which may proceed on grounds of utility, or some other grounds quite apart from those of strict law, it cannot be required that, as Cogordan desires, the certificate of the home State should have an absolutely binding force for the courts and officials of another country; possibly, too, it should be remembered, the State which is alleged or thought to be the home State is not so in reality. In questions as to entering military service, it may often be useful to give a liberative effect directly by means of a treaty to the certificates of a friendly government. But, without such a treaty, courts are not tied down to accept such certificates. The criticism, therefore, which Cogordan passes upon the practice of the Belgian courts, in forcing persons of indeterminate nationality to serve in the army, is unjustifiable. Karminski, pp. 52 et seq., is more correct in maintaining that a judgment as to the invalidity (more properly the non-operation) of nationality, given by a foreign State, is only the other side of the judgment, that the person in question still belongs to our State. Karminski on this ground defends the judgment which the French courts pronounced in the Bauffremont case.

are acts of sovereignty, it is not all foreign judgments that will be recognised as operative in our country.¹¹ We allow the decree of naturalisation full effect in the territory of the foreign State, we deny its effect in ours.¹² Thus, assuming that a femme séparée de corps cannot without her husband's authority acquire a foreign nationality, the result in the Bauffremont case in our view would be, that, postulating the validity of the Imperial statute of 1875, the German naturalisation in Saxe-Altenburg would be recognised as operative in the German Empire, but as inoperative in France.¹³ As regards other States, however, the question must have different answers given to it, according as the marriage is looked upon as indissoluble, as was then the case in France, or as, on the other hand, divorce is regarded by the law or by the State as the only legal mode of affecting the relation of married persons. That result falls in with what actually came to be decided in the end. The French courts, in their judgments, held the naturalisation in Altenburg to be invalid; the Appeal Court in Brussels, on the other hand, definitely refused to put into execution the French decree, by which the Princess, under threats of exceedingly heavy fines, had been condemned to deliver her children to their father, on the ground that such compulsory procedure was contrary to the droit public recognised in Belgium. This ground of judgment is highly doubtful. For if it was only the compulsory procedure taken in France that was at variance with public law as recognised in Belgium, the answer is that, if the judgment of the French court was to be recognised as being the national tribunal of both parties, the Belgian compulsitors must be substituted for the French, or the French compulsitors reduced to the measure of those which are recognised in Belgium. But under the guise of the vague and elastic theory of the exclusiveness of the droit public, we find the working of the feeling that those restrictions upon freedom, which at that time the law of France imposed upon the femme séparée de corps, could not prevent

¹² No doubt it is a conceivable legal proposition that the loss of nationality should be attached simply to the fact of naturalisation in another State. It would then naturally be of no moment whether this naturalisation did or did not correspond with the principles of nationality which are recognised by us, or with general principles of public law; the only circumstance to be considered would be whether the foreign State would maintain its naturalisation. In that case, the view opposite to ours, which is specially represented by Folleville, p. 353, would be right. But the 17th article of the Code Civil [as amended in 1889] can hardly be understood in so literal a sense: "Perdent la qualité de Français; le Français naturalisé à l'étranger." naturalisation in a country which recognises a full divorce as the morally justifiable and morally necessary remedy in cases where one of the spouses has irretrievably transgressed the proper relations of married persons. Lastly, it is worth remark that, as the foreign tribunals refused to give execution of the French decree, although that refusal was not put upon exactly correct and regular grounds, this result, which de jure was the correct result (supposing that the Princess observed the formalities required by the law of the German Empire), was produced in the end, that the Princess was in the dominions of the French State a Frenchwoman, and subject to the law of France, but, as far as the jurisdiction of other countries was concerned, was not a Frenchwoman.

¹³ We have already noticed that in Altenburg, at the time when the certificate of naturalisation was issued, the rule of the Imperial statute had not yet come into force. On this account the validity of the naturalisation was certainly exposed to serious doubt. Besides that, the validity of the marriage which the Princess afterwards contracted in Berlin, does not by any means follow from the validity of the naturalisation in Altenburg for the German Empire. On the contrary, Stölzel's pamphlet points out sharply and irrefutably that the Princess, to be validly married as a German woman, should first, by the decree of a German court, have had her decree of separation pronounced in France turned into a true divorce. If the Princess took the advice of counsel for the steps which she took in the German Empire, she was not extraordinarily well advised.

NATURALISATION in fraudem legis.

§ 68. If the home State must refuse to recognise the validity of a naturalisation that is contrary to the requirements of its own law, and similarly must refuse to recognise the validity of a release¹⁴ from its ties of citizenship, the question arises whether the same thing is not to be said of naturalisation carried through in fraudem legis; that is to say, of naturalisation which is at once dissolved by a return to the original country? This question commonly comes up for discussion, when such an expatriation and re-acquisition of nationality has taken place with the clear intention of using the law of the country, in which the naturalisation takes place, to carry through a marriage or a divorce which is not allowed by the laws of the home State.

In the first place, we must remember, what is generally overlooked, viz. that there is in such questions a very real distinction according to modern German law, and also according to French law, between domicile and nationality. For domicile an intention of permanent residence is required; accordingly, if the emigrant had no such intention, and did not wish to stay at his new place of abode, he has in fact not acquired a domicile. If, then, for instance, a decree for divorce is obtained in the courts of the alleged domicile, founded on its law, that decree will not be recognised in the home State of the divorced spouse, because of the incompetency of the court to determine the question. This is a true case of an act in fraudem legis. The fact to which the law was applied has been disguised:¹⁵ the pretended domicile was not the true one. The jurisprudence of England and the United States, which makes personal law dependent on the law of the domicile, is quite right in refusing effect to a change of domicile which is made in fraudem legis.¹⁶ But, on the other hand, that change is not in fraudem legis if the emigrant really has the intention of remaining in the foreign country, but has the purpose of availing himself of its law, which is more favourable to him, or pleases him better.¹⁷ If, then, a man, who has once really changed his domicile, afterwards, however, changes his mind, his emigration will not, of course, by any retroactive process, become a fraud upon the law. His return, and particularly his speedy return, at the most will, under certain circumstances, be held as proof that he had from the first no intention of making a permanent stay.

But the result is different, if the nationality has been acquired not by domicile or by a long-continued residence, but by a formal act of adoption into the community of the State. It is against the essential nature of any such formal act, to put its validity to the uncertain test of an intention which is known only to the person himself. The certificate of naturalisation must to some extent be a solemn attestation of the nationality of the person receiving it, and we must admit that the official, who gives out such a certificate, must hold that there exists a serious intention on the part of the immigrant to become a citizen. But, further, this intention does not require to be immutable, and so even a speedy return to the old State is no convincing proof against the seriousness of that intention. French practice, however, applies all the doctrine that is applicable to the case of a domicile¹⁸ to the case of nationality. A divorce obtained abroad by persons who openly, and simply to obtain this divorce, have had themselves naturalised abroad, and forthwith returned to France, and again

obtained French nationality, has been declared invalid, because a naturalisation, obtained in fraudem legis, was to be regarded as inoperative.¹⁹

It is, as a matter of fact, true that by naturalisation of such a kind the laws of any State may be very simply evaded. But Cogordan and Weiss, for instance, do not fail to notice how dangerous it is to go into a proof of intention in such cases. Cogordan prudently says that the law by no means recognises naturalisation in such cases as altogether null; the person so naturalised shall only be prevented from pleading his naturalisation to the prejudice of third parties, and against those laws of the State which he intends to evade. But, if this cautious limitation be admitted, the whole theory becomes very arbitrary. Is it in fact possible to set up such a division of the effects of nationality, that we should regard a Swiss naturalised in Switzerland as still a Frenchman in his character of husband only, while to all other effects he is a naturalised Swiss? If we were to have regard to the interests of third parties who are in good faith, it may very easily turn out that these are at variance with each other.

It is then better to throw aside this theory; such is de Folleville's view (pp. 295 et seq.), to which Pilicier (pp. 281 et seq.)²⁰ has recently attached himself. It is nothing but an expedient to meet two principles which cannot be recommended as guides for legislation, one of them in particular being peculiar to French jurisprudence. It is a legislative error to give naturalisation to a foreigner, without requiring of him a protracted stay in the country as a preliminary, and it is likewise erroneous to make it excessively easy to recover the original nationality, as the law of France does. If the former of these erroneous principles is recognised in a neighbouring State, the Frenchman can change his nationality as he pleases, and, in fact, laugh at the coercitive or prohibitive laws of his own country. Cogordan, therefore, is not wrong in recommending the principle of the Bancroft treaties, which we have discussed above, as applicable to the law of citizenship everywhere.

4. CHANGE OF RESIDENCE AS A CONDITION OF NATURALISATION.

§ 69. It must, however, be laid down as an absolute condition of the international validity of naturalisation—and also of its domestic validity, i.e. of its validity even in the State which confers it—that the person to be naturalised should take up, or should already have taken up

¹⁹ The change of domicile necessary to give effect to the naturalisation may no doubt only be a simulated one, and the validity of the naturalisation may thereby be prejudiced (see below). But, as a rule, the actual fact of a change of residence will be present in the cases which we are now considering. See, too, what is afterwards said, §§ 77 et seq., as to option.

his residence in the territory of the State.¹ If nationality essentially consists in a right of residence, which cannot be destroyed by any act on the part of the State alone, the necessary consequence obviously is that a person, who enters into the ties of citizenship with the State for the first time, must work out this relation in fact,² by removing his residence into it. The tie between the person and the State must first be constituted in fact.³ In such a matter, in which the very foundations of the State are concerned—for the persons who belong to a State are certainly one of its most essential foundations, if not the most essential—no legal fictions can be allowed to take the place of facts, and on no terms whatever can they claim an international operation. In proof of this, we may refer to the fact that most States now require, as a condition precedent to giving naturalisation, that the applicant shall have made a stay or had a residence in the country for a considerable period. Italy⁴ and the German Empire no doubt are exceptions to this rule.⁵ In § 8, sub-sec. 3, of the German statute, the only condition for a grant of naturalisation that is required, is that the foreigner shall find a residence or lodgings in the place where he proposes to settle. It is not said that he must have taken a residence, and § 10 provides:—

“The certificate of naturalisation . . . gives rise to all the rights and duties connected with nationality, as at the moment at which it is issued.”

§ 10 therefore contains no express provision that the certificate of naturalisation shall first become operative when the person naturalised takes up his residence in the country. But we may very reasonably interpret these paragraphs to mean, that the person therein referred to may exercise all the rights of a citizen after delivery of the certificate, and

¹ Thus, before the first revolution in France, the royal letters patent, by means of which naturalisation was effected, first became operative when the person in whose favour they were granted had taken up his residence in France. Cf. Aubrey et Rau, Droit Civil, i. s. 71, note 3.

² It would be a distinct offence against the principles of public law, if a State were independently to give a right of citizenship to persons who never set foot on its territory. Wharton, Digest, ii. § 173 (p. 344).

⁵ In France no regard is paid to any domicile but one authorised by the Government. Although this rule is in general open to objection and not very desirable, it has this importance, that the period of antecedent domicile in France can thus be authenticated. In the [law of 1889] the requirement of a three years' authorised domicile antecedent to naturalisation is retained, [with the alternative of ten years' actual residence. Employment in French service abroad is held equivalent to residence in France.]

will be held to the performance of all the duties of a citizen. It may also be maintained that from this moment all the rules of criminal law may be applied to him, which are applicable only to Germans.⁶

On the other hand, the effects of nationality upon matters of private law, in so far as such results are attached to that character, cannot come into play without a change of residence, and just as little can diplomatic protection, which none but a citizen can claim, be given to one who has been naturalised without fulfilling this condition.⁷ An exception to the rule can only be justified—putting out of view the naturalisation of a married woman, which is privileged in another way—in the case of a foreigner being naturalised by an appointment in the service of the State with the sanction of his home State, or after a release granted by it. Active service to the State is not a pure fiction, like naturalisation without change of residence in other cases, and, if there is added to it a release by the home State, the appointment may be set at least upon a level with a change of residence.

Further, to establish as firmly as possible the formal and authentic character of naturalisation, it may be desirable to provide that the full effects of naturalisation, including those which it may have on matters of private law, should first come into play, when the foreigner has satisfied the local magistracy of his change of residence, and has received a certificate that he has done so. Such a provision is, of course, not necessary if one of the conditions of naturalisation is a residence for a settled period in the State. The legislation of the United States takes this view, and indeed goes further, by requiring all the conditions of naturalisation to be authenticated in a court of record.

DOMICILE FOR A CONSIDERABLE PERIOD ?

§ 70. We have already remarked that the overwhelming majority of legal systems require as a condition of granting naturalisation, except in

⁶ The German statute, as we have remarked, does not require a change of residence before issuing the certificate of nationality, but it does require (§ 8, subsec. 3) that the applicant shall point out a place in which he intends to settle, and shall find a house of his own or lodgings there. Besides, the provision which regulates the case of a release from citizenship (§ 18, subsec. 2) may be cited in support of the view, that the German law only recognises the full effects of naturalisation, when the person concerned has shifted his residence into German territory. Officials of the empire, however, who are to do their duty abroad, cannot well satisfy the requirement of finding a residence. A special Imperial statute, of 20th December 1879, accordingly provides, "That foreigners, who are appointed to the Imperial service, drawing a salary from the Imperial treasury, but who have their official residence abroad, cannot be refused naturalisation by any of the States of the empire from whom they demand it." § 9, subsec. 2 of the statute of 1870, as to citizenship, provides for other cases, "If a foreigner is appointed to the Imperial service, he acquires nationality in that State of the empire in which he has his official residence."

⁷ But, on the other hand, no objection founded on public law can be taken to a State protecting as its subjects in the territory of other States, persons domiciled in its territory, who have the intention of acquiring nationality there, but have not as yet fully and finally done so; for the State might have allowed nationality to be acquired with the domicile. Cf. Wharton, Dig. ii. § 198 (case of Koszta).

certain exceptional cases, of which the most important is the naturalisation of the wife by her marriage, a domicile that has existed in the territory of the State for a certain period antecedently. This requirement of a continued domicile is only a question of domestic policy. One State may be apprehensive of an excessive pressure of applications for naturalisation; another may think it desirable that foreigners should immigrate in greater numbers; another may think that the burdens which it lays upon its citizens are a sufficient deterrent against the incursion of undesirable elements into its population; while yet another may think that it is a sufficient safeguard to arm its officials with a large discretion to give or refuse naturalisation. At the same time, however, it does seem desirable, from an international point of view, to require a certain period of domicile,⁸ if it be not too long, e.g. one or two years, since by that means international conflicts on the question of nationality would be more easily avoided, and so too would these undesirable attempts at naturalisation, which French jurisprudence is inclined to regard as done in fraudem legis, and therefore as ineffectual. It is a pity that the German statute has not set up any such period. An exception might be made, for the case of naturalisation by appointment to the public service.⁹

From the international point of view, there is still less interest in the question, whether the naturalised person shall at once be allowed full political rights, and whether there shall be degrees of naturalisation, and, if so, what they shall be? The only point of importance for international law is the grant of a right of residence which cannot be revoked by either the State or the individual without the other. Again, it is a mere question of domestic policy, whether under certain conditions naturalisation can be demanded as a legal right, or whether it is to be regarded as a matter for the discretion of the officials of the State.¹⁰

Every State may refuse to admit foreigners according to its good

⁸ In our opinion such a period corresponds with the dignity of a sovereign State; the person who is to be received into the community of the State must first to a certain extent show by acts his dependence on the State, and at the same time prove by his conduct that he deserves admission.

¹⁰ There may be a distinction taken (Laurent, iii. § 174) between a système de droit and a système de grace (faveur) in naturalisation. Laurent, as a legislator, would hold in favour of the système de droit; but his reasons are very weak, and are indeed more phrases than reasons, e.g. "La patrie avant tout un droit et une obligation." How could it be proved that any nation was obliged to receive any foreigners that chose to come, and to any number, as citizens, with all the rights that belong to that character? An exception is only practicable in the case where there has been residence for some time, during which the foreigner has behaved himself irreproachably. The system, by which naturalisation could be demanded under certain conditions, which were not difficult of fulfilment, only lasted a short time during the first French Code. Even in the United States it is not absolutely the rule. For although it is a court of law that disposes of applications for naturalisation, that court has to be satisfied of the character of the applicant, and of his attachment to the institutions of the United States.

pleasure. That is a result of the obvious, natural right of every free association to establish such conditions for reception into its membership as suit itself. Thus, for instance, the United States only receive immigrants who are white.¹¹ Lastly, it is of no importance as an international matter, whether a special act of the legislature shall be required for a naturalisation that is to have full effect—a thing which would, however, as a general rule be impracticable.^{12 13} It is, however, undesirable in the interests of international intercourse to allow naturalisation to be tacitly acquired by a residence that has lasted for some time. The proper way, as Laurent soundly remarks, is to look upon naturalisation as a formal act.

5. PRIVILEGED NATURALISATION OF MARRIED WOMEN.

§ 71. The naturalisation of a foreign woman who marries a citizen is a privileged species of naturalisation, which by almost all legal systems¹ takes full effect ipso jure, and without any special or formal legal act.

This rests upon the thoroughness of the tie which binds the spouses, and which even the law must recognise.² But, at the same time, the formal act of naturalisation has its equivalent in the marriage ceremony, or at least in the habit and repute of married life enjoyed by the spouses (possession d'état). If freedom of marriage is to be allowed, the State must,

² The element of consent which is necessary in naturalisation may, as a rule, be found here in the consensus matrimonialis (cf. Weiss, p. 144). We must not, however, require any special consensus for the acquisition of nationality: the wife, who is in minority, follows the nationality of her husband (cf. Laurent, iii. § 156. Folleville, No. 472, Cogordan, p. 257; Habilis ad nuptias, habilis ad nuptiarum consequentias). The law recognises the unity of the family, generally speaking, as proper and desirable. Even although she may have been mistaken as to her husband's nationality, her nationality will follow his.

in this equivalent for naturalisation, waive the performance of any of the conditions which in other cases it requires. A discretionary power in the government to interfere in such cases would be intolerable. Reasons of the same kind induce us to look upon the naturalisation of the wife, by means of her marriage, as a complete ground for expatriation, and one that would operate ipso jure.^{3 4} There are no particular duties to the State laid upon women at the present time, in connection with their nationality, and therefore this is not a matter of any importance. To this we must add the tradition of the Roman law of domicile, which has had its effect upon the development of the law of nationality. Thus, in almost all legal systems of the present day, the propositions we have laid down are recognised as law. Even the law of Russia recognises the expatriation of a woman born in Russia by means of a marriage with a foreigner.⁵ In the United States there is no doubt now that it is part of the statute law that the wife, by marrying a citizen of the United States, herself becomes a citizen of the Union: but it not so with the converse case, that the wife, by marrying a foreigner, loses her right of citizenship in the Union. But no practical consequences seem to attach to this retention of citizenship (Wharton, Dig. ii. § 186).

In this connection it seems to be a matter of debate:—

First, whether the wife, on entering on her marriage, can retain the nationality in which she was born. This question is more properly answered in the negative, and French jurisprudence is fixed to this effect,⁶ although that system allows the wife to retain for herself the nationality of her husband, which existed at the date of the marriage, or which was acquired by virtue of it, if the husband proposes to acquire a new nationality during the subsistence of the marriage, and although, too, in French law the dependent members of a family do not, as a matter of course, follow the naturalisation of the head of the family. In legal systems which, like the German, hold the minor child, who is still under his father's potestas, to share in his father's nationality, the question must multo magis be answered in the negative. The view of the German

³ In this case it is not necessary to take up a residence, as a matter of fact, in the State to which the husband belongs.

jurisprudence goes in the direction of holding that the wife cannot retain any other domicile for herself.⁷

Secondly, does the wife unconditionally follow her husband's nationality—so that no assent on her part is necessary—if her husband changes his nationality after the marriage is concluded.⁸ French jurisprudence⁹ answers this question in the negative. It is said that the wife who marries a husband of another nationality knows this, and must accordingly accept the consequences which this circumstance brings upon her. But the case is different when the naturalisation takes place for the first time during the marriage. Besides that, it suggests itself that a naturalisation of this kind, if it is to have immediate effect for the wife as well as for the husband, may be abused, e.g. to alter her legal capacity or her right of succession. English and [Scottish] jurisprudence,¹⁰ as well as that of the United States, and also that of Germany, appear to be overwhelmingly of the opposite opinion, although the question with which they have to deal is primarily a question of the domicile, as it, in the view of the jurisprudence of England [Scotland], and the United States, and the prevailing theories of law in Germany, gives the rule for personal law. The question is therefore a much more important one in British and German law than any question of nationality for a woman, who has nothing to do with most political rights.¹¹ This view may have much more to recommend it, and may be much the more correct view in principle,¹² from the necessity of maintaining the unity of the family. But here, as in the case of the obligation on the wife actually to follow her husband, these exceptions must be made, viz.: First, the wife shall not be required to naturalise herself in any uncivilised or non-Christian country, or in any country that is unsettled;¹³ secondly, that she shall be able to plead her right to demand, in the courts of the country to which the spouses have up to this time belonged, a dissolution of the marriage on the ground of some fact that has already occurred, as a reason for being ⁸ Divorced wives (and women permanently separated by Catholic ecclesiastical law likewise do not (according to the sound view) follow their husbands' naturalisation (cf. Karminski, p. 28).

⁹ Cogordan, p. 256; Laurent, iii. § 526; Weiss, pp. 149, 150. But see, on the other hand, Brocher, Nouv. Tr. pp. 128 et seq., "qu'on introduise pas un élément de dualité et de désordre dans un rapport qui exige impérativement l'unité."

Reps. 4th ser. xv. 1102, the rule that the wife's domicile must follow that of the husband is laid down, under the qualification that, when a cause of action has arisen, a husband cannot by a change of domicile subject his wife to the courts of a foreign country.]

¹¹ Seydel, in Hirth's Annalen, 1876, p. 138, says as to the naturalisation of a foreign woman by marrying a German: "This effect of marriage is a necessary effect, which cannot be excluded by any reservation."

¹³ Cf. Richter-Dove ut cit. In European countries, the duty of following the husband is not in itself limited; on the other hand, it is out of the question if the residence chosen by the husband is shown by the circumstances to have been dictated by heartless cruelty.

free of her obligation to be naturalised. If the wife does actually follow her husband, and if the rule, that naturalisation at once extends itself to the wife, is recognised in the State in which the husband is naturalised, we may presume that she has tacitly accepted the naturalisation. Even the law of France would, in such a case, not hesitate to hold that there was a change of residence "sans esprit de retour," and therefore expatriation, and a new naturalisation.¹⁴

If the marriage is null, i.e. null by the law which decides as to the validity of the marriage, the naturalisation is also null, and the declaration of nullity must have a retrospective effect.¹⁵ In the case of a putative marriage the wife, if it seems to be for her advantage, can retain the nationality which could only have been acquired by her but for this circumstance through a real marriage, and if the nullity of the marriage cannot be pleaded ope exceptionis, the wife must be held to be naturalised in the State to which the husband belongs¹⁶ (i.e. must be entitled to put forward her claims to any special privileges that may belong to a person who is naturalised there) until the nullity of the marriage is judicially declared.

Divorce, on the other hand, has this effect, and this only, that it gives the divorced woman the power of altering her residence and her nationality at her pleasure. The effect of divorce in this matter must be determined according to principles which rule it as regards other matters also.¹⁷

6. IS THE DEMAND FOR NATURALISATION A HIGHLY PERSONAL ACT? NATURALISATION OF CHILDREN WHO ARE STILL UNDER THE patria potestas. NATURALISATION OF PERSONS UNDER AGE.

§ 72. In the subject of which we are now to treat, we find very substantial differences in different legal systems.

One section considers naturalisation to be an act which requires, as one of its conditions, a highly personal declaration of intention, which cannot be given by deputy.¹ Thus the curator can never apply for naturalisation

¹⁵ Cf. Cogordan, p. 257; Weiss, pp. 147, 210. In any case, the effect of the marriage must be provisionally recognised.

¹⁶ Cf. Cogordan and Weiss ut cit. Struckmann and Koch, Commentar zur deutschen Civilprozessordnung, § 17, express themselves to this effect on the question of domicile.

¹⁷ Cf. the French practice as reported in Jour. vi. p. 278; Aubrey et Rau, Droit civil, i. § 73, note 4.

for his ward, or acquire it for him, nor can the father for his minor child. This is in particular the theory of the jurisprudence of France.² Other systems, the German³ for instance, and also the Italian,⁴ make the naturalisation of the father extend to minor children who are still in patria potestate. Besides that, the German statute (§ 8, 1) speaks expressly of the point, that want of capacity in the person to be naturalised may be supplemented or supplied by the consent of his father, guardian, or curator.

For the French system it is argued that the paternal power at the present day exists more in the interest of the child than in that of the father, and that it cannot decide as to the interest which the child may have in the retention of his former nationality. But that argument is a petitio principii. The question to be determined is simply how far the paternal power is to go; may it not be in the interests of the child that another nationality should be at once acquired? It can, however, hardly be denied that the actual dependence of the child in other respects upon his father, the right of the father to educate it, his right to fix its residence, is in most cases much more important for the destiny of the child than the formal determination of his nationality, especially if it be the case that the country of birth allows the children of a subject who has been naturalised in another country some privilege in certain circumstances in reacquiring the previous nationality. Thus the formal nationality is often of little importance. The French doctrine, however, is not unfrequently in contradiction to the real facts of the case; the son of a Frenchman naturalised abroad, who has been educated abroad, and who has all along grown up there, may learn, to his complete surprise, that he is still held to be a Frenchman and treated as one, and that he is to be called upon to discharge the duties proper to a Frenchman. The French principle, too, interferes with the unity of the family, which is so desirable. Parents and children will belong to different nationalities, and possibly one section of the children to this nationality, another to that. That easily begets confusion in their legal relations, and frequently operates otherwise in a disturbing fashion. We may say that in the higher stages of civilisation it is only education that completes the man: the separation of the children from their parents, particularly from their father, before they have attained full age, the recognition of individuality in its full scope before that point of time, is therefore anomalous.⁵ The most recent project for a

³ § 11. "The grant of nationality, unless it is expressly limited, extends to the wife and the minor children, who are still under the paternal power."

French statute to regulate the question of nationality (Weiss, pp. 300 et seq.), in its fourth and thirteenth articles has at least adopted the principle of the unity of the family, and thus extends the naturalisation and, as a rule, also the expatriation of the father to minor children and to the wife. [This has been law in France since 1889.]

But, from practical considerations, we conclude that the principle of the unity of the family is not to be dealt with as strictly obligatory. We shall rather concede to the father the right of excepting his children, or some of them, from his naturalisation.⁶

The laws of Germany and Switzerland deal with the matter in that way. If we start from the principle that the conditions of the capacity of a person who desires naturalisation are to be tested by the law of that State to which he has hitherto belonged, it follows logically that his naturalisation cannot be extended to his children, if the law of the State to which the children have hitherto belonged gives the father no power at all to regulate the nationality of his children.⁷ If, nevertheless, his naturalisation were extended to his minor children, the question for decision in the original State, in conformity with the observations made already in § 62, would be whether the naturalisation was still operative, and how far it was so. Cases can further be conceived where a father, on emigrating, desires for good reasons to preserve for sons and daughters, whom he proposes to leave behind him, the nationality which they acquired by birth. In these cases also such a reservation can be made available on the ground of the father's express declaration. If a mother is naturalised in the German Empire, the naturalisation does not directly extend to the children, for the mother has not the patria potestas. The principles as to the acquisition of naturalisation by guardians for wards must rather be the principles to regulate this case.

7. EFFECT OF RELEASE FROM THE TIES OF A STATE UPON THE DEPENDENT MEMBERS OF A FAMILY.

§ 73. It seems to be necessarily involved in the principle of the maintenance of the unity of the family, that loss of nationality by the head of the family draws with it the loss of nationality for the children who are still in family. This deduction is drawn in the German statute, § 19,¹ for the case of release from allegiance: it is also drawn in the Swiss statute, art. 8, which requires by its sixth article, in a case of renunciation of Swiss nationality, that the person renouncing it shall have already either acquired another nationality, or have at least an assurance that he can acquire one. The Swiss statute further requires it as a condition that the children must be living with the father in family. The German statute imposes this last restriction (cf. § 21, subsec. 2)² only in the case of the loss of nationality by an uninterrupted residence of ten years abroad, a method of losing nationality which is unknown to the law of Switzerland. In fact, we cannot well ascribe to the problematical legal institute of the absolute loss of one nationality without simultaneous acquisition of another such an effect on the circumstances of dependent members of the family. If the father leads the life of a vagabond, and consequently in the eye of the German law loses his German nationality, his family, which remains in the country, can hardly on that account become foreigners. The more general limitation of the Swiss statute seems, however, on other grounds, to correspond better with the nature of the subject. If a father emigrates with a number of little children, but leaves an elder son, almost grown up, behind him, who is, it may be, in attendance at some seat of education in the country, and has no desire to emigrate, shall this son, if the official who gives his father naturalisation omits to make the necessary reservation, become a foreigner? On the other hand, the question whether a child was living in family with his father may often give rise to doubts. This requirement does not suit very well the formal character which, as we saw, we must as much as possible, in the interest of legal security, give to the Act of naturalisation. It would perhaps be better to lay down some such rule as this, viz.:—"Release and naturalisation are always extended to the minor children, who are still under the paternal power of a father who is released from the ties of citizenship, or admitted to them, as the case may be, in so far as the father has the power, by the personal law hitherto enjoyed by him, of altering the nationality of his children. The official who is concerned with the release or naturalisation, as the case may be, is, however, bound, besides attending to the obligation of military service in cases of release, to exclude expressly those children who are living apart from their father, and who in all probability will not follow their father.³

⁷ It is upon this consideration that the provision of the 3rd article of the Swiss Federal statute specially rests. Cf. Zeitschrift für Schweizer. Recht, 20 (1878), appendix, p. 38.

¹ The release extends, in so far as it is not expressly limited, to the wife and to children who are still under the paternal power.

² The legal system of the United States (Revised Statutes, p. 2172. Cf. Wharton, Dig. ii. §§ 184, 185) regards children, who at the date of their father's naturalisation in the United States had not yet attained the age of twenty-one years, as citizens of the States, if they are resident in the territory; and, according to the practice of the State Department, the rights of citizenship are lost by those children of an American citizen who go abroad with their father, after attaining full age certify, it may be by acts that lead to the inference, their intention not to return again to the United States. It is, further, assumed that the will of the father is decisive of the question whether the child, in a question of nationality, follows the father (cf. Wharton, p. 409), and that this will, which may be declared by acts leading us to infer it, may also go so far as to prevent a child from following him, and thus make it retain its subsisting nationality.

The question of minority in such cases is, however, to be determined solely by the law of the State to which the party has hitherto belonged.⁴ The point is as to the maturity of the individual, whereby he shall be put in a position to take a decisive resolution for himself, and this question of maturity must be determined by the law of the nationality to which he has up to this point belonged. There can be no such question in that case as that which arose in the discussion of the Bauffremont case, viz. a question of a restriction on the freedom of the individual, which the law of the State that is asked to naturalise must regard as absolutely inadmissible.

The question whether the State will receive as independent persons into its citizenship, persons who by their own law are not yet of full age, is quite a separate question. It may perhaps be convenient to answer that question in the negative. The rule of French law (see statute of 1889, § 5) seems to imply this, for it requires an authorised residence of three years, an actual residence of ten years, important services to France, or marriage to a French woman, coupled with a year's authorised residence. But in addition to the provisions of that law, it would be necessary to require the applicant to have attained majority by the law of the State to which he has hitherto belonged, as, for instance, Weiss (p. 109) distinctly holds to be incumbent even in French law.

REACQUISITION OF A NATIONALITY THAT HAS BEEN LOST.

§ 74. Should the reacquisition of a nationality that has been surrendered or lost be facilitated or privileged?

The question raises no point of international interest, in so far as a State may give its old citizens a legal claim to reacquire their citizenship in certain cases,¹ while naturalisation is in other cases purely a matter of discretion for the officials. There is no question of international law raised, if the reacquisition of nationality has simply been preceded by the loss of it, and not at the same time by the acquisition of some other nationality. For the only matter here dealt with is the revival of rights and duties, which cannot in any way come into conflict with the laws or the rights of any foreign country.

It is a more serious matter if the law, in a question of reacquiring a former nationality, gives up its requirement of a domicile for a certain period, or reduces to a minimum the length of domicile which in other cases it requires. The law of such a provision facilitates a fraudulent evasion of legal duties in another aspect. The French system, influenced on this point by the vague idea of a connection with the country of birth or of descent that has its source in the law of nature, and must therefore, as far as possible, be respected, facilitates the reacquisition of French nationality to the utmost. French law recognises no particular periods at all for the reacquisition of nationality. This has led French jurisprudence to have recourse to the theory of a naturalisation that has been effected in fraudem legis, and is therefore invalid, a theory which is legally most doubtful. The fraus, according to this doctrine, is found in the object, and not in the conditions of the naturalisation. Of course, if any system of law requires a long period of domicile to give complete naturalisation, that period may be shortened for persons who wish to return to the country of their origin.

⁴ See the distinct direction of the German statute as to nationality, § 8, No. 1.

¹ The German statute, § 21 ad fin., makes a new grant of naturalisation obligatory in the case of the loss of it by an uninterrupted absence for a period of ten years.

The only cases requiring exceptional treatment in this matter are that of the wife who by marriage with a foreigner has lost her nationality, and on the dissolution of her marriage desires to reacquire it, and that of children who by the naturalisation of their father in another country have become foreigners.²

We must, however, hold fast to the proposition that the reacquisition of the former nationality requires a formal and an express declaration before an official. No exception from this requirement can be made, even in favour of a wife returning from abroad or remaining in the country after dissolution of the marriage.³ The English statute, by its eighth section, provides that the British subject who by naturalisation abroad has lost his

² See the Code Civil, art. 10, 18 and 19, as to the privileged position of the widow and children according to the law of France.

³ The ruling French doctrine is shown by the judgments of the Court of Cassation of 19th May 1830 and 13th Jan. 1873 (Jour. viii. p. 151), and in relation to Belgium the judgments of the Belgian Court of Cassation of 10th Feb. and 1st Mar. 1876 (Rev. viii. p. 489). On the other side is Laurent, Principes de dr. civ. i. § 397. The 19th article of the Code Civil ad fin., viz. "Si elle devient veuve, elle recouvrera la qualité de Française, pourvu qu'elle réside en France, ou qu'elle y rentre avec l'autorisation du chef de l'Etat, et en déclarant qu'elle veut s'y fixer," is interpreted by him to mean that the wife, if the spouses have at the last been living in France, by the very fact of remaining in France may again become a Frenchwoman (cf. Weiss, p. 245). [This section is practically unaltered by the statute of 1889.] It leads, however, to legal uncertainties. See against it Lehr, Rev. xvi. p. 248, and Weiss, ut cit. The Italian municipal statute book very properly requires, by its 14th article, an express declaration before an official, whether the widow is in the country or is returning to it (cf., too, the English statute of 1870, § 10, subsec. 2, whereby the widow requires, for reacquisition of her English nationality, a certificate which is to be given to her at any time she asks it). Is a preferable position of that kind only to be given to a widow, or is it also to be given to a divorced woman, or to a woman who became a foreigner not on the occasion of her marriage, but at a later date, by following her husband to another country? It looks as if these latter questions should be answered in the affirmative. [The French Statute of 1889 expressly does so answer them.] The wife who follows her husband abroad at a later period, is in truth less free in her acceptance of her expatriation than one who marries a foreigner; if the expatriation of the husband is to have an immediate effect upon the wife, that is all the stronger reason for giving her a privilege in the reacquisition of her nationality. But as regards the wife who has been divorced abroad, she in the same way will as a rule deserve the privilege of being entitled to claim the restoration of her

British nationality, can only recover it by the same means that are necessary in the case of a born foreigner who is claiming to be naturalised as a British subject. It gives him no legal right to claim it. In this statute a privilege is also given to a widow, who has become a foreigner by her marriage. In the case of readmission, minor children follow the father or the widowed mother, as the case may be, upon condition that they are resident in England.

H. NATIONALITY IN FEDERATED STATES.

§ 75. In federated States there is a double nationality to be considered, first, that which consists in the attachment to the federation as a whole, and, second, the right of citizenship in the different individual States, out of which the federation is made up. In such cases, the citizenship which has reference to the federation as a whole may be looked upon as the foundation of the citizenship of each individual State, or, again, the latter may be regarded as the primary citizenship. In the former case, the acquisition of citizenship in the federation will directly involve the acquisition of the rights of citizenship in a particular State: in the latter case, the acquisition of citizenship in one of the constituent States will directly involve the acquisition of citizenship in the federation. The two kinds of citizenship may, however, be so connected that the co-operation of the federal authority, and of some official of one of the constituent States, is necessary in order to confer citizenship. The first principle is the law of the United States,¹ the second the principle of German Law,² and the third is that of the law of Switzerland.³ But these are all questions solely of domestic legislation. They do not need to be any further considered here.

I. CHANGE OF NATIONALITY IN CONSEQUENCE OF A CESSION OF TERRITORY. OPTIONS.

nationality as a legal right, if she desires to return to her own country and her own people. But this right should not come into existence at once; it should only be recognised after the lapse of some fixed period, so that the native law of marriage may not be too easily evaded by a foreign naturalisation, and a foreign divorce following on it. According to French law, the wife of a foreigner divorced abroad does not ipso facto reacquire her French nationality by being divorced. See the judgments reported in Jour. vi. p. 278.

² The case of a complete debellatio or annexation is different from that of a cession. In that case the natives of the conquered, or (if the less exact expression "annexed" is preferred)

It is a rule sanctioned by usage, and one that is absolutely necessary, if the inhabitants of the ceded territory are not to be driven out, that these inhabitants become citizens of the State³ to which the territory is ceded. More modern custom in matters of public law, however, allows the individual inhabitants of the ceded territory the right, under certain conditions, but free of any tax for withdrawal, to preserve for themselves the nationality of the State which has made the cessation, to declare their option in its favour.⁴

The first question, then, which comes up is, Who is a citizen or inhabitant of the ceded territory?⁵ Who is it that, unless circumstances are of the annexed country simply become citizens of the conquering or annexing country, not, however, by the simple fact of the occupation of the country by the enemy, but by subjecting themselves to the conquerors by remaining in the country after the occupation. Cf. Burlamaqui, Principes ou éléments du droit des gens, iv. c. 8, § 2; Vattel, iii. c. 14, § 213. A formal vote of the population, a so-called Plebiscite, can certainly not be regarded as necessary. Cf. v. Martens, i. pp. 353 et seq.

From this it follows that natives of the conquered country, who leave it before the conqueror definitely takes possession of it, do not become citizens of the conquering country. Cf. specially on this point (in connection with a case which occurred after the occupation of Hannover, a process of high treason against Count Platen-Hallermund) Zacharia in the Gerichtssaal, xx. (1868) p. 225: Allgemeine deutsche Strafrechtszeitung, 1868, pp. 304-320, and opinion there quoted of L. Neumann of Vienna; Stoerk, Option und Plebiscit, pp. 152 et seq. The Royal Prussian Court of Justice, by its judgment of 8th July 1868, in contumaciam recognised the opposite view (cf. Goldammer, Archiv. f. Preussisches Strafrecht, 1868, vol. xvi. p. 798). Stoerk, ut cit. p. 156, is of opinion that the conqueror must allow the inhabitants of the conquered country a free right of emigration up to a certain point of time, unclogged by the fulfilment of any oppressive political duties. The principles laid down in Wharton's Dig. ii. §§ 187, 188, with reference to the consequences of the American declaration of independence, agree with that opinion of Stoerk. A dethroned sovereign has in no case a domicile or a right of citizenship in the country which he has left, nor is he subject to its courts. Cf. judgments of the Appeal Court of Turin of 8th Mar. 1871, and of the Court of Cassation at Turin of 25th Aug. 1866 reported by Norsa, Rev. vi. p. 253.

altered by a special option, will for the future be a citizen of the State that has acquired the territory? Is it the person who has been born in the ceded territory, or the person who was domiciled there?⁶ Of course, in putting this question, it is assumed that the person who is to change his nationality, by such a cession of territory, belongs in every case to the State that is making the cession. For citizens of a third State, even if they be assumed to be domiciled in the ceded territory, cannot be affected in their nationality by the cession. There is this practical advantage in determining the question by the place of birth,⁷ that there is less opportunity for doubts and disputes, especially when we consider the accuracy of the records of statistical offices in modern times. But that rule is at variance with actual facts. The place of birth is of very little consequence for individuals within one and the same State. The only place of practical importance is the place of residence, the centre of the man's whole activity, which as a rule is at the same time the place where he exercises his political rights, and is the place in which, in the event of his falling into poverty, he will find relief. Löning (p. 203), Cogordan, and Weiss declare for the place of residence.⁸ Mixed systems, whereby either those alone who have their residence in the ceded territory, or were born there, are to change their nationality, or those only who combine these two qualifications, are to do so, are capricious and devoid of principle. The former system unfairly prejudices the State which is making the cession, the latter the State which is receiving the territory. No doubt, as Löning properly notices, with the principle of domicile may quite well be combined a permission by the contracting States, in the case of an important cession of territory, in order to fall in with the wishes and necessities of individuals, by which their respective subjects, within a specified period, may claim a right to emigrate and to naturalise themselves elsewhere. This was what happened e.g. in the Peace of Zürich of 29th Nov. 1859, and in the Peace of Vienna of 30th Oct. 1866, in connection with the cession of Venice. The principle of domicile was accurately observed, i.e. to the effect that, failing the exercise of a special option, it was those who were domiciled in the territory, and those only, who changed their nationality. On the other hand, the treaty of 24th March 1860, by which Nice and Savoy were ceded to France, is indistinct; and still more indistinct is the treaty of peace concluded between France and Germany in 1871.⁹

⁸ See the practice of the United States, Whart. Dig. ii. §§ 187, 188; Foote, p. 6.

⁹ The French and German treaty, in its second article, was concerned simply with the question of option. The question as to what persons, by virtue of the treaty, and apart from any option, became Germans, is not touched. This defective drafting has been the source of disputes and mutually contradictory decisions. There was probably a difficulty in understanding what the principle embodied in the treaty truly was. The treaty itself spoke of the option of those only who were sujets originaires domiciliés. In accordance with this expression, § 77. Option, in its historical origin, is simply a formal declaration of emigration. In order that it may receive effect it is, strictly speaking, necessary for any person who exercises an option in favour of the State that makes the cession to transport his residence into its territory; and the State which has acquired the ceded territory must be allowed the right¹⁰ of expelling all persons who have made this option, but who, as a matter of fact, still remain in the country. Otherwise the incorporation of the ceded territory with the State that has acquired it would be made impossible by a disaffected population, and the conquering State would lose all the price of its conquest and the consideration for the treaty of peace.

§ 78. In our view, the definite formal act of taking possession must *ipso jure*¹¹ change the nationality of all persons whose nationality can be changed. Were that not so, then the conquering State, uncertain who would declare for the option, would, until the expiration of the time for making that declaration, have no subjects at all in her new territory, supposing that every one had a right to declare this option. One need only contemplate the consequences of such a state of things, to pronounce it to be from the point of view of public law an impossibility.¹² Is it to

it may have been supposed that the interpretation of the treaty, much to the disadvantage of Germany and impracticable in its results although it was, truly was that, even without exercising an option, all remained French who, first, were resident there under the French Government, although not born there, and, second, all who had been born in Elsass Lothringen, although they had no residence there. The supplementary convention of 11th December 1871 (Reichsgesetzblatt, 1872, p. 7), in its first article regulated the matter of option for persons who were born in Elsass, but who had no residence there; its provision was that the second class described above should necessarily exercise an option, but, strange to say, it left the first class, which doubtless was much more important for the German Government, without any mention. The German Government subsequently maintained the necessity for an option on the part of that class, and a change of residence to give effect to it; the French Government has refused to recognise this ruling. (On this point see the thorough examination by Cogordan, pp. 340 et seq.)

¹⁰ Both, for instance, are recognised as necessary by Weiss, pp. 213 and 217. But the treaty between France and Germany has again, by its faulty draftmanship on this point, led to many mistakes, many disappointments to the inhabitants, and subsequent measures of constraint by the authorities. It is said in the second article that "sujets originaires des territoires cédés domiciliés actuellement sur ce territoire" who desire to maintain their French nationality, "jouiront . . . moyennant une déclaration préalable, faite à l'autorité compétente, de la faculté de transporter leur domicile en France et de s'y fixer." That looks as if a formal declaration of the option was sufficient, and the persons exercising the option had the privilege merely of afterwards transporting their residence to France, this transportation of domicile not being necessary to give full effect to the option. This idea is still further encouraged by the German text, which speaks of the privilege (Befugniss) of shifting the residence.

¹¹ This is the older French theory. Cf. Jour. v. pp. 13, 14.

¹² On this ground we must support the view taken by the German Imperial Ambassador, in a despatch of 1st September 1872 (cf. Cogordan, pp. 345 and 410), addressed to the French Government, although the peace of Frankfurt left the point doubtful (see note of v. Rémusat, in Cogordan, p. 344), and the French Government took a different view of it. The literal words of the second article of the treaty where it speaks of options, "in which case their character as French citizens shall be maintained"—"auquel cas la qualité de citoyen français leur sera maintenue"—no doubt supports the opposite view. On the other hand, in the protocol to the

be supposed that the State which is surrendering the territory should attend to the interests of its inhabitants in the meantime in questions with third States, although it is perfectly certain that by far the largest part of the inhabitants will, and must in the end, follow the fortunes of the surrendered territory?

§ 79. Then, too, the retroactive effect which, for instance, Weiss ascribes to options, must in our view be most distinctly negated. Such a retrospective declaration of intention, in so fundamental a matter as nationality, is extremely hazardous, and has only been adopted in French jurisprudence because that system denies guardians and fathers the right of emitting binding declarations in regard to nationality for wards or minor sons, as the case may be.

§ 80. In this question of option, we find again the question coming up for consideration whether, and to what extent, the dependent members of a family, wives and minor children, follow the nationality of the husband and father. In truth, if we assume that persons belonging to the ceded territory ipso jure enter the civic bonds of the conquering State, and that no retrospective effect can be ascribed to option, it is merely a privileged form of expatriation and of naturalisation on the other side. The same may be said of the question as to how far persons generally, who are under age, can with the assent of father or guardian, as the case may be, exercise an option. Here, too, we find the futility of the principle by which minors and their legal representatives are absolutely denied the right of choosing their nationality, and by which the exercise of an option is necessarily therefore deferred until the young persons have attained full age.¹³ A State, which must do its best to win over a still disaffected population, cannot assent to such a postponement of the choice of nationality, by which the rising generation would be allowed to remain in the country, and then suddenly, at the very time when they reached an age to bear arms, to treaty of 31st August 1877, by which Sweden gave up the island of St. Barthélemy to France (given in Cogordan, pp. 376 et seq.), this language is used of those who, up to this time, had been Swedish subjects domiciled on the island, "et la nationalité française, leur sera acquise de plein droit à dater du jour de la prise en possession par l'autorité française." In the same protocol, we find immediately afterwards a mention of the "conservation" of Swedish nationality (art. 2). As these two articles 1 and 2 cannot be in their literal acceptation read together, we may take that as a proof that we should not press the literal reading too far. Folleville, p. 428, is, in agreement with the judgments of several French courts (e.g. Nancy, 31st August 1871), of the opinion that the inhabitants of Elsass Lothringen remained French pendente conditione. This opinion hangs upon the words "maintenue" and "conserver:" it overlooks, as we believe, the juristic impossibility of such a state of things which we have laid down in the text. In the judgment of the German Reichs Gericht (2nd Civilsenat) of 8th January 1884, reported in Jour. xii. p. 332 (Blum. Annalen des Reichsgerichts, ix. p. 330), stress is laid upon the literal expression of the Frankfort treaty, and the inference is drawn that the husband in question never became a German; but the decision itself would have been the same in the circumstances, if the court had started with the opposite assumption, i.e. the assumption in the text.

declare themselves to be foreigners.¹⁴ Obviously this cannot be the case, even although, according to the law recognised in this surrendered territory, expatriation and naturalisation are in ordinary circumstances recognised as competent only to persons of full age. We must, then, give in our adhesion, at least for the time when the German law of nationality had not yet come into force, to the view which was, for instance, adopted by the German authorities, who refused altogether to recognise options exercised by non-emancipated minors in Elsass Lothringen.¹⁵ On the other hand, this shows us how impracticable it is, in the matter of nationality, to set up the principle of individual choice, or to take any other principle but the unity of the family as the rule. If a son who is under age, and not yet emancipated, is allowed to exercise an option independently of his father, the State which has acquired the province is exposed to a peril which is contradictory of the spirit in which the province was ceded. The father, who is growing old, makes his son exercise an option in favour of his own old country, and sends him across the frontier to some place of education, in order to satisfy the requirement of the law that he shall change his domicile. The son will fulfil his military duties there, and afterwards return into the ceded territory without hindrance, and without being threatened with any loss by reason of having evaded the law. For the State is unwilling, after the lapse of a considerable time, to have recourse to the highly unpopular remedy of expulsion from the territory, while the family property and family trade remain in the hand of the father, who has never left his home. [By an agreement of 1st July 1890, embodied in the statute 53 and 54 Vict. c. 32, which deals with the cession of Heligoland to the German Empire, the German Government allows all natives of the island the right of declaring for British nationality, personally or by their parents or guardians, before 1st January 1892, and all persons who make such declarations will be free from obligations for military service.]

§ 81. Lastly, the question may be raised on this subject, too, to what extent we may speak of acts in fraudem legis, and of an invalidity resulting from that cause in the option which is exercised. In so far as the option consists in a formal declaration, we have no right to concern ourselves, in accordance with what has already been laid down with any inward intention or reservatio mentalis. On the other hand, a change of domicile may very well be merely illusory: it is in such a case no change at all, and cannot be recognised. Under certain circumstances, it may be inferred from the speedy return of the emigrant that his change of residence was not seriously intended to be permanent. This conclusion, however, is open to error, in so far as it is based exclusively upon the speedy return of the person who has exercised an option. For a merely temporary return does not prevent there having been a real intention of emigration, and if this intention did truly exist in the case of the change of residence, a subsequent return to the original domicile would in its turn again be of no importance.

We must, therefore, in cases of doubt pronounce the exercise of the option to be valid, if only we can find a fact which can be regarded externally as a true change of domicile. This course, too, is specially commended by the consideration that the interest of the public generally, and very frequently too of third parties, is concerned to maintain the formal publica fides which is involved in a grant of nationality. The State which has acquired the territory will find the proper weapon, with which to defeat options followed immediately by return to the country, in its powers of expulsion.¹⁶ However much freedom we may as a rule concede to foreigners to take up their residence in our country, the exceptional circumstances of a territory which has been newly won demand exceptional rules. The abnormal fact—a fact, however, which may very possibly happen in the case with which we are dealing—that the majority of the inhabitants of the ceded territory should as a matter of form attach themselves as citizens to the country making the cession, while as a matter of fact they retained their business and their property in the territory which is given up, might render fruitless the acquisition, and would be apt to retain for generations, as the owners of property and the directors of the commerce of the country, and so indirectly as the controlling factors in politics, a population which is distinctly hostile to the State which made the conquest.¹⁷

§ 82. The question whether the State that makes the cession should grant the privilege of naturalisation to the persons who belong to the ceded territory on easy conditions, is a matter solely for the legal system of that State to consider. In our opinion, however, it is juridically wrong¹⁸ to place the inhabitants of a ceded territory on the same footing as persons who have emigrated voluntarily. It may no doubt be said that persons who have ceased to be citizens of any particular country, in consequence of some compulsitor of public law, deserve such favourable consideration more than men who give up their country voluntarily. But in so arguing, it is forgotten that, juridically considered, regulations of territory sanctioned by public law must carry with them the presumption of being proper demarcations of States and nationalities till they shall be altered again. The man, then, who belongs to the ceded territory, and was before its cession a Frenchman, is in the eye of the law to be considered as if he were not a Frenchman by extraction. On this point, it is quite immaterial whether the surrendered territory has belonged for a long time or only for a few years to the State which has now ceded it: the boundaries between two such cases would be difficult to draw on legal principles. Conflicts can only arise, however, out of such privileged treatment if the State which has ceded a territory proposes to set itself above the conditions of expatriation which are recognised in other circumstances, and, without regarding the conditions, tries to protect persons who have left the ceded territory against the demands of the other

¹⁷ In so far as birth in a particular territory is a foundation for citizenship, the citizenship will invariably be that of the ceded territory, but not that of the State which makes the surrender, in case such a distinction should exist. If, then, the rule that the child born in the country of a foreign father, who has himself also been born in that country, becomes ipso jure a citizen of the country of its birth, be recognised, it does not apply to the case in which the birthplace of the father has in the meantime been severed from the State in which the son is born. A case of this kind was decided by two French judgments in different ways, and without really touching the punctum saliens. The judgments were, one of the Cour de Paris (Chambre Correctionnelle) of 11th June 1883, the other of the Court of Cassation of 7th December 1883 (Jour. x. p. 505, and xi. p. 268). In such a case, there can be no question of the family having been incorporated with the State: the place of birth in such a case is simply of no consequence, and the descent of the child decides the question. The Court of Cassation held French citizenship to be established in the case in question according to the literal reading of the statute, because the father's place of birth was French territory when he was born.

State, e.g. for military service, even while these persons are residing in the territory of the conquering State.

§ 83. That piece of territory, however, in which a man is born, or, if domicile be assumed as a regulating principle, in which he is domiciled, must always in strictness be considered his country, and not that greater whole from which that piece of territory has been divided. That an individual has the power of electing to belong to the greater whole rather than to the part is an exception, a privilege, to preserve the freedom of individuals; for public law must proceed upon the assumption that the inhabitants of any territory have grown up in it just as plants have grown up in different parts of a garden. The opposite theory is at variance with the practical necessities as well as with the logic of theory. In this way, the older French jurisprudence, which held children born in France to be foreigners, if the father belonged to a ceded province, and had not specially reserved his French nationality, was right. The most recent jurisprudence, which was inaugurated by a judgment of the criminal chamber of the Court of Cassation, of 7th November 1883, adhering as it does merely to the letter of the statutes of 1851 and 1874, has led to unexpected difficulties in the matter of the obligation of the sons of Belgians born in France to bear arms, and is properly criticised by Roche (Jour. xiv. pp. 303-312).

K. FORMAL DETERMINATION OF NATIONALITY.

§ 84. It is a question of great practical importance how nationality is to be determined¹ in cases of dispute or doubt. We have here to consider both how such questions are to be determined within each country and for each particular State, and how they are to be determined for international intercourse. The one set of questions touches the other, but they are by no means identical.

As regards the former, we may instance the case of the German Empire: in it there are no means of determining nationality recognised as authoritative everywhere. The determination of nationality rather comes up as a prejudicial question in lawsuits, or in matters brought before administrative officers for their decision. In every case in which nationality is the condition of a right, a power, or a duty, the official that has to decide upon this right, power, or duty, settles the existence or non-existence of the nationality according to his own convictions. The view which some other official has taken of the applicant's nationality, in deciding as to some other right or duty of the same individual, is in no way binding. It may, therefore, happen that different officials may some of them affirm, some of them negative, the nationality of the same individual; and it is by no means rare for judicial decisions to contradict the views of administrative officials.

In France,² on the other hand, it is the case that in many, if not in all matters of administration, an objection taken by any interested person that the view taken by the officials on the matter is wrong—e.g. that one who has been drawn for the conscription or placed on the list of electors is not a Frenchman—can be disposed of by legal procedure, by a special process of determining nationality. There then takes place a kind of preliminary suit. In so far as the decision arrived at in this suit regulates all questions that touch this individual, whether in matters of administration or of public law, the arrangement is excellent, and one that is to be generally recommended. It is, however, a matter for consideration, if it is proposed that a decision thus reached shall have binding force for civil suits with third persons, who have taken no part in the preceding judicial enquiry. At the same time, it must not be forgotten that these decisions are de facto looked upon by the public as decisive, and, relying on them, people contract with him who has been recognised as belonging to the State. If a contrary decision were subsequently to be given, it might involve mischievous disturbances of these beliefs. It may, perhaps, be worth while to suggest a middle course. While it should be made possible to get a judicial decision on the question of nationality in all matters of administration, the determination of which is at all dependent upon the fact of nationality, it might be provided that this judicial decision should be res judicata for all like points of administration, and should regulate them, but besides that for the future, in so far as private disputes are concerned, it should have the effect of naturalisation, or of a release from the ties of nationality, as the case might be. In this way the decision would have, in the matter of private legal relations, the effect of conferring or of destroying rights not ex tunc but ex nunc, and for the future it would serve the desirable end of guaranteeing a formal determination of nationality. The person whose nationality is in question would also have the right to appeal to such a decision even if no question were in contest with any third party, if he had an interest to have it determined, e.g. in order to be able to contract a valid marriage.

§ 85. A judicial decision on nationality can never claim a formal and binding validity in another State, and in the processes that may arise there; it can never be recognised as res judicata, since no judgment except that of a tribunal that is competent in an international sense has such an effect, while, again, the question of competency in such matters must itself necessarily depend on the nationality of the person concerned. We shall have more to say on this subject later, in discussing the doctrine of res judicata. A judicial decision on nationality is, within another State, never anything but evidence, the weight of which depends on the grounds on which it is based, and on the estimation in which the tribunals and officials of the other State are held. If it is known that, as in the German Empire, the officials of the State, to the courts of which it fell to pronounce judgment, are not themselves bound by judgments of the same sort which incidenter settle questions of nationality, little force can be given to these judgments in a foreign State. It would be otherwise if the decisions served at the same time as a process of naturalisation or of release, as the case might be. A certificate of naturalisation or of release irrefutably demonstrates itself to be a document that in the former case creates, in the latter annuls certain rights. It is, therefore, evident to the other State that at the specified time the person in question either was a citizen of the former State, or, if the judgment is to a negative effect, that that State would make no claims upon him which could interfere with naturalisation elsewhere, and all its natural effects. The judgment would then acquire the force of a so-called certificate of nationality, and of a certificate as to the recognition of which, by all the officials and all the courts of the State from which the judgment proceeded, there could be no doubt.

In modern times much use is made of so-called certificates of nationality—that is, certificates by some official that So-and-so is a citizen: there is no great objection to allow such certificates to have the effect of proof in the case of voluntary jurisdiction, i.e. on the question whether certain acts of voluntary jurisdiction can be done by the person concerned. They have, however, no absolute effect as proof in the case of litigations;³ and as the issue of such certificates should in many cases be preceded by very difficult enquiries, but in fact is not, the public has no sufficient guarantee for the legality of legal transactions undertaken on the basis of such certificates, if the legality of these transactions, e.g. in the case of the solemnization of a marriage, depends upon the nationality of the persons who take part in them.⁴ This misfortune would be avoided if, in cases where it was needed, a decision such as we have spoken of could serve as a certificate. Besides that, many States hold that there is an objection to allowing any such certificates to be issued;⁵ or it may be that, as in France, there are no officials competent to issue them.

⁵ The State that issues such a certificate by some authorised official is bound, unless it can establish its non-liability, to receive the person who is described in it, if he is not naturalised elsewhere, and to support him if he becomes a pauper.

L. PLURALITY OF NATIONALITIES.

§ 86. Should legal systems allow the possibility of two or more nationalities existing in the same individual at the same time?

Long ago¹ no difficulty was found in recognising a plurality of nationalities in one and the same individual,² but in the present day the overwhelming weight of scientific authority is against it.³ Every individual bears a certain obligation of loyalty towards the State to which he belongs; in the case of a conflict, which may take place at any time between two completely independent States, he can only observe this loyalty completely towards one of them.⁴ But, in so far as we are to make the so-called personal law dependent on nationality, it will be impossible for us to recognise more than one nationality in any individual.⁵ If, then, a State, in giving a license to a subject to become the citizen of another State, at the same time reserves that person's existing nationality, no other meaning can in doubt be attributed to this reservation than that, if the new citizenship be lost or surrendered, the old one shall at once revive. Thus, on the one hand, a right to be received back again into the citizenship of the former State is conferred upon the person in question, and, on the other, no naturalisation of any kind whatever is required for the purpose; the reacquisition takes place ipso jure. In any event, it would be convenient, that in cases where a special license is given to enter the citizenship of another State, the State which gives the license should concede to the other the first right⁶ to dispose of the resources of the

³ So Feuerbach, Themis (1812), ii. pp. 213 and 323: cf., too, e.g. Vesque von Püttlingen, § 12, p. 41; Phillimore, i. 378. See, too, the letter of Crémieux, the French minister of justice, to Lord Brougham, cited by Cogordan, p. 14, and Calvo, ii. p. 93; v. Martitz, p. 806; Bluntschli, Rev. ii. p. 110; Völkerrecht, § 373; Cogordan, p. 171; Geffcken, note on Heffter, § 59a; v. Martens, ii. p. 184; Laurent, iii. § 144; Weiss, p. 11.

The theory of public law means, by sujets mixtes, owners of property whose properties, once subject to one and the same sovereignty, are, in consequence of changes of territory, put under separate sovereignties, and who on this account have special advantages secured to them by treaties, e.g. facilities in obtaining passports, right of free residence, etc. See, on this subject, Vesque v. Püttlingen, pp. 41-43.

⁶ Bluntschli, Völkerrecht, 3rd ed. § 374, note 12, has declared in favour of this view. Logically, the same decision must be given in the case that the native State, in place of giving individual who has gone over. How could he always be in a position to withdraw himself from the power of the State in which, as a matter of fact, he happens to be? That connection which, as a fact, comes more closely round the individual, must naturally take precedence in the case of any such conflict: the principle of freedom of emigration leads to the same result.⁷

M. GENERAL RESULT. CONFLICTS. TREATIES.

§ 87. The results of the foregoing enquiry may be thus summarised:—

Nationality is the formal right to live or reside permanently in the territory of a State, a right which cannot be taken away by the State's own action. Although its origin is in descent, it presents, as regards a second acquisition or a dissolution, the formal features of the law of domicile in this sense, that it cannot be acquired unless a residence is acquired, and cannot be dissolved without a change of residence, while, if it is once established, a mere change of residence is of no consequence. While the principle of nationality agrees with that of domicile in allowing the individual the largest possible freedom to give up the national connection he has up to this time had, it is distinguished from the domicile of the common Roman law in respect that, first, one nationality can only be completely dissolved by the acquisition of a new one,¹ and, second, that as a matter of principle we cannot recognise a plurality of nationalities subsisting at the same time and complete to all effect.

§ 88. If these principles are rightly carried out—principles which, strange to say, Cicero is known to have described as those of the Roman law, and which are in modern times supported by a constantly increasing number of votes²—there will be very few conflicts between different legal permission to acquire a foreign citizenship, has allowed a subject to enter a foreign military or civil service. The question whether such a permission has been legally given must be settled by the domestic law of the State of origin.

¹ We have frequently pointed out that some effects of a nationality may continue, while others have already ceased. It is a mistake for a legal system and for science to neglect this possibility, which disposes of a great number of the conflicts that occur.

² Cogordan formulates these principles thus, viz.:—

"1. Que tout homme doit posséder une nationalité.

"2. N'en avoir qu'une.

"3. Pouvoir la changer." systems. But in the present condition of legal systems they are anything but scarce. The question is, how they are to be dealt with?

These conflicts may be of a positive or of a negative kind. A negative conflict exists, if none of the States that can be taken into account in the particular case will recognise the individual as belonging to it, while we have a positive conflict in a case where several States simultaneously regard the individual as belonging to them. In practice, the former kind of conflict will hardly admit of any other result than that the nationality, which has existed up to that moment, should be held to continue if a new one has not been set up.³ As we have already seen, States have de facto been unable to get rid of this result, in so far as concerns the reception of subjects who have at some time emigrated from it. The positive conflict, on the other hand, in so far as it arises from the opposition of a thorough-going jus soli to the principle of descent, which, in modern times, is advancing further and further, is juridically and scientifically insoluble.⁴ The strict jus soli is in fact, as we have said, a principle which belongs to a past period, and does not suit our times. In point of fact, at the present day, if a conflict occurs, the claims of the State which founds upon the jus soli must be repelled. As regards conflicts, however, which spring from naturalisation, here the native State cannot so easily be required absolutely to surrender its claims. For every State must primarily test the justice of its claims, and the freedom of emigration, by its own legal system.⁵ Freedom of emigration is, however, the ruling principle: it has a presumption in its favour, whereas all presumptions are against any effect being given in international questions to restrictions upon this right. While, therefore, two States with rival claims may each give effect to its own claim within the sphere of its own jurisdiction, third parties (States) must test questions of nationality by reference to the judgment pronounced by the individual himself in question, in accordance with the principle of freedom of emigration. The result is that States, other than the two rival claimants, must, apart from special treaty, recognise the State which the individual has himself last selected, as entitled to claim him.⁶ The procedure recognised by English diplomacy,⁷ and now, too, by English legislation,⁸ whereby one who has been naturalised in England, although he has not been legally released from his previous allegiance, will be recognised and protected as an Englishman all the world over, except only within the territory of that State from whose allegiance he has not been legally released, is therefore absolutely correct. By this means the conflict, if not altogether settled, is, as regards public legal claims upon the individual,⁹ reduced to tolerable dimensions. Weiss (p. 292) proposes to make such a conflict impossible, by recognising it as an universal rule that no one should be naturalised, unless he has been released by the State in which he has had his home. But this must be rejected as an universal rule, because naturalisation might be unduly limited by the selfishness and narrowness of other States, and the freedom of emigration might be in a great measure rendered illusory. Although smaller and weaker States may, in order to escape difficulties, have resolved to betake themselves to this or to some similar rule, it would form an unworthy principle of conduct for great and powerful States.¹⁰

⁵ Positive legislation must in this connection consider that, "whereas the acquisition of any nationality depends on the law of the State in which it is to be acquired, the loss or the dissolution of nationality is dependent on the law of the State to which the individual has hitherto belonged." Judgment of the Court of Lyons, 19th March 1875, Jour. iii. p. 183, and of the French Court of Cassation, 19th August 1875, Jour. iv. p. 9, quoted by Labbé. Judgment of the Belgian Court of Cassation, 12th June 1876, reported by Dubois, Rev. xiii. p. 61. On the other hand, the question whether any person is naturalised in any particular State must be determined by the law of that State. Judgment of the Swiss Bundes-Gericht of 21st April 1882, reported by Martin, Rev. xvi. p. 487.

§ 89. Undoubtedly, however, nationality is a subject which admits of regulation by treaty without any insurmountable difficulties, and with remarkable advantage in the avoidance of conflicts. We may then emphatically recommend the conclusion of treaties on the subject of nationality from the scientific point of view. The Bancroft treaties, which we have already discussed, prove how profitable such treaties are, even although they are not faultless. We must not, however, set to work hastily. Before such treaties can claim a wider recognition, science must explain still further the principles which should be followed in such

⁸ § 7 of the statute of 1870, and Weiss's commentary on it, p. 273.

⁹ We can but approve the decision of the courts of the country in which it is contended that naturalisation has taken place, in upholding this as valid, and assuming it as a ground for judgment, although the native State may in such a case refuse to recognise the naturalisation or expatriation of the person in question. So the Civil Tribunal at Geneva, 9th December 1882, Jour. x. p. 531. The judgment dealt with the naturalisation of the wife of an Italian who had been naturalised in Switzerland: she was said to have retained her Italian nationality in virtue of the provisions of article 11 of the Cod. Civ. Ital. It is perfectly clear that our country must recognise a nationality which, according to its own law, exists in spite of some other nationality which by the law of some other country still subsists, in all relations, at least, which are for the benefit of the person concerned. For instance, the State can never extrude as a foreigner a person who by its own law is not a foreigner, even although by the law of some other State he is to be recognised as a citizen of it.

matters, and must have laid them down with their logical results. Besides that, it may well be that deviations from general principles may recommend themselves to particular States for adoption with reference to the release of their own citizens, and the reception of foreigners as new citizens in respect of geographical, political, or politico-economical considerations. A general combination of civilised States seems to be in the immediate future possible only as regards certain points. The answers received by the Italian Government, on the occasion of its laudable attempt to introduce a general agreement on certain principles of private international law, even on this question of nationality, were as a rule to the effect either that there was no disposition to change the principles hitherto observed in the different countries in the direction of establishing an international agreement, or that they saw no reason for it, or held such attempt to be very serious. Again, many conflicts might be got out of the way, if true and practical principles were adopted by the different legal systems. A most productive source of conflicts, on the other hand, is to be found in the material agreement of different legal systems on legal propositions which are unsound. The constant conflicts between France and Belgium on questions of nationality are a striking proof of this.¹¹

N. DETERMINATION OF PERSONAL LAW BY DOMICILE OR BY NATIONALITY.

POSITIVE LAW.

§ 90. The last of the more important questions which falls to be discussed in this connection is this, viz.: Is the personal law of each person to be dependent on the law which prevails at his domicile, or on the law which prevails in the State, the citizenship of which he enjoys? We may, too, put it in this way, viz.: If, in certain questions, the decision must be in accordance with the law of the home of the person, are we to understand, by the expression "home," the domicile or the State which is entitled to lay claim to the person as one of its citizens?

This question, as we have said, could not arise while the conceptions of nationality and domicile were identical, or were not sharply separated from one another, and while naturalisation had quite a subordinate importance. For the first time in modern times, the question was sharply put by Tronchet,¹ in consultation on the third article of the Code Civil. The result was the second subsection of this article, viz.:—

"Les lois concernant l'état et la capacité des personnes régissent les Français (i.e. Français within the meaning of the Code Civil) même résidant en pays étranger."

¹¹ Cf. on such conflicts, Jour. vii. p. 613; ix. p. 416.

At the same time, the ideas of French jurisprudence² have also affirmed that foreigners in France, in all that concerns their “état” (within the meaning of the civil law) and their “capacité,” shall be judged not by the law of the place where they are living, but by the law of the State whose subjects they are.

The French theory was very soon adopted by the Austrian legislator, but, unfortunately, it was so obscurely expressed by the latter that it gave rise to a controversy which has not yet been completely settled. The fourth section of the General Civil Statute Book for Austria, of 1811, provides:—

“Citizens of Austria continue bound by the laws of Austria in all transactions and undertakings which they may make or carry on beyond Austrian territory, in so far as their personal capacity to do so is limited, and in so far as these transactions and undertakings may be alleged to give rise to legal consequences in Austria.”

On the other hand, the thirty-fourth section provides:—

“The personal capacity of a foreigner to enter on legal transactions is in general to be determined by the law of the place to which the foreigner, in virtue of his residence, or, if he has no proper residence, by virtue of his birth, belongs as a subject: in so far, that is to say, as this or that particular case is not otherwise provided for by the law.”

In consequence, it is plain that Austrians are to be judged by the law of their own State, and the great majority of Austrian writers

² Cf. Aubry et Rau, i. § 23; Bard, § 131; Durand, p. 249; Brocher, i. No. 43; Asser-Rivier, No. 23 (p. 56); Laurent, ii. § 97. (Cf. also Asser, Rev. vii. p. 400.) No doubt Haus, p. 66, Demangeat on Fœlix, i. p. 28, and Barilliet, Revue pratique du droit français, i. p. 66, are of a different opinion. The text of the code is obviously incomplete. If we are to criticise it closely, we should require a statement as to what law is to regulate foreigners in France. That the French legislator should make such an enactment would not be any excess of his jurisdiction, any more than it is an excess of jurisdiction for the code expressly to subject French people, during their stay in a foreign country, to the laws of France in all that concerns their status and their personal capacity. Of course, the French legislator cannot ordain foreign courts to apply this principle; but he can provide that French courts shall, for instance, test the dealings of Frenchmen carried on in a foreign country by the law of France. If any such objection as we have indicated is taken to the authority of the French legislator, it merely shows a forgetfulness of the fact that in the ultimate resort, in questions of international law, the determination rests with the court in which the question is depending. (But see, on the other hand, Durand, p. 249, who commits the very fault which he is criticising, because he pronounces that no legislative provision as to the status and capacity of foreigners is admissible, and on that ground defends the incompleteness of the French enactment. It is well known that other more modern systems have not placed any such erroneous limitations on their own powers.) Haus ut cit. defends his divergent view on the ground that article 3 of the code leaves the droit des gens in force for foreigners, and that it makes domicile the criterion. Nationality, he thinks, is a principle unknown to the droit des gens. Haus (p. 68 and p. 130) lays down also that a Frenchman or a Belgian, who has acquired a real domicile abroad (and not a mere residence there), has lost the character of a Frenchman; for a domicile with an animus redeundi (esprit de retour) is in truth no domicile. In his view, the principle of domicile is the ruling principle for Frenchmen and Belgians abroad. There is, however, in the somewhat vague expression, “sans esprit de retour,” something more involved than the purpose which the older jurisprudence of France required for the establishment of a residence within the bounds of France.

hold³ that foreigners too must be judged by the law of their nationality. Others, and among them especially Unger (§ 23, 1), hold, on the other hand, that the law of the domicile will regulate the case of non-Austrians.

All those countries in which the Code Civil, or some adaptation of it, constitutes the law,⁴ have therefore adopted the principle of nationality. Besides these, we must include the Italian Civil Statute Book,⁵ as must seem obvious after what we have said (§ 28), on the principle of nationality, and the Royal Saxon Civil Statute Book.^{6 7} In Switzerland, in the majority of the cantons,⁸ the principle of determining the personal law according to the law of the place of a person's nativity is the ruling principle; while in other cantons, especially in the west, the principle of domicile prevails.⁹ This latter principle has been curiously described by recent Swiss writers as the territorial principle.¹⁰

On the other hand, we shall not be surprised to find the Allgemeines Landrecht of Prussia, which belongs to the last century (Introduction, §§ 23-25),¹¹ makes domicile¹² the rule, and the same is true, in consequence of traditional usage, as a rule in all the countries in which the so-called common law prevails.¹³ There have been, however, some recent decisions of German courts, especially on matrimonial questions, in which some weight has been laid on nationality.¹⁴ Lastly, the principle of domi-

⁷ According to Asser, Rev. vii. pp. 401, 402, the principle of nationality is the rule in Russia.

⁸ These are the German cantons.

⁹ Articles 46 and 47 of the Federal Constitution of 1874 have certainly in appearance laid down that questions of this kind are to be regulated by the principle of domicile. In truth, however, they only make promises for the future, and at the same time the law of Civil Status of 24th December 1874, in so far as the legal relations of other than Swiss citizens are concerned, proceeds again on the principle of nationality. See on this subject Brocher, Nouv. Tr. No. 20, and Muheim, p. 86.

The decision of the Civil Senate, iii. of 7th May 1880 (Dec. ii. No. 39) shows that there are cases to which the principle of domicile is inadequate. In the latter decision, it is truly remarked that the legal relations of German nobles must be determined in German courts according to German law, although the nobles concerned may be resident abroad.

cile is beyond all question the rule in the extensive sphere of English and American law.¹⁵

REASONS FOR THE TWO DIFFERENT PRINCIPLES.

§ 91. Traditional usage is the leading ground on which the supremacy of the principle of domicile is founded in countries where the so-called common law, or the law of England or America, prevails. Recently, however, attempts have been made to base this principle on general considerations. The most thorough of these attempts have been made by Lorimer and Wharton. Lorimer (i. p. 428) declares himself in favour of the principle of domicile in accordance with his general theory, by which fact and right ought never to be separated. The "localisation" of the individual, in fact, must therefore determine his personal rights, whereas, on the other hand, political rights and private rights should be sharply divided from each other. To make a person's private rights depend on a merely formal naturalisation—one that has taken place without a residence having been acquired in the country which grants it—would be to fly in the face of actual facts: if, again, we require residence in the country as a condition of naturalisation, in the first place it would be the residence that would be the truly important factor, and at the same time we might impede that free movement of individuals which is so desirable. The theory of the necessary correspondence between fact and right, however, can only be applied under the greatest caution, and with large limitations: otherwise it upsets all law and right. In our view, nationality itself is nothing but a residence under special qualifications or conditions, and, again, it seems to us to be anything but desirable to separate, as Lorimer proposes, for generations it may be, private and political rights in the same persons; and to allow families, whose members have lived for generations abroad, to exercise political rights in our country. The opposition between fact and law would become specially glaring, if we were to divide private from political rights in the same individuals in any such fashion. The free movement of individuals may often, too, be impeded if the position is to be that every change of domicile, which is simply a de facto change—and such cases may often be very difficult and doubtful—is to threaten a change of a man's whole personal rights. Wharton, in repelling an attack made on this theory by Laurent, who again sees in the respect paid to domicile a mere survival from the feudal system, is of opinion that the principle of nationality or citizenship will suit only States that are themselves unities, and will be unsuitable for compound States like the United States or the British Empire. In these a large number of different systems of law are recognised, and nationality accordingly has no connection with any particular system of civil law. Besides, he argues, nationality is far more difficult to determine than domicile; and again, in the case of the United States, the principle of nationality is unsuitable on this account also, that in a country which still desires a constant increase of her population, and into which there is continually streaming a flood of emigrants of various nationalities, it would operate as a mischievous restraint and as a peril for all intercourse, and especially for the law of marriage, and would open the door to deceit and treachery, if any regard were to be paid to grounds of incapacity, which by the law of the nationalities of these immigrants might possibly be found to exist. In this last argument we get a glimpse of a tendency, which is more and more passing out of view in English jurisprudence and practice, but which not unfrequently turns the scale in the practice of the United States, viz. a tendency to set a simple residence of some not too short duration on a level with domicile; and generally to make the law of the home—under which term we may understand domicile to be included—give way to the prevailing force of the law that is recognised at the place of the transaction, e.g. the ceremony of marriage.

Now there can be no doubt, and this much we shall concede to Wharton, that the principle of nationality suits best States that have an uniform system of private law. But it may also be quite well adopted by States which are compounded out of several provinces, and have manifold systems of private law. For, supposing that the person in question belongs to the Empire State as a citizen, it may quite well be that his domicile should settle the particular rights that are to belong to him; this is a point on which we shall have something to say on another occasion. Again, the determination of a man's nationality no doubt has to encounter pretty frequently juridical difficulties, as our investigation has already shown, and from a juridical point of view the theory of domicile seems simpler. But this greater simplicity as a juridical idea is de facto more than compensated by the great difficulties which arise in the proof of domicile; and if we determine personal rights by domicile, we cannot avoid the danger of subjecting the circumstances of individuals, even in matters of family law and of succession, to some particular law which shall be contrary to their own views and expectations. Least of all can we support the last of the reasons adduced by Wharton. If it is a matter of importance to the United States that grounds of incapacity, by which domiciled foreigners are affected according to the law of the country of their origin, should not receive effect in the United States, we should recommend them to facilitate naturalisation so far as to allow it to take place before the lapse of the time that is at present required for its completion, without its being held to confer on the immigrant any political right which could be acquired subsequently. To identify real domicile with a stay of short duration, however, leads to a system of international law whereby insoluble conflicts in the spheres of marriage law, family law, and the law of guardianship, are made the prevailing state of things, and must in the long run, as commerce and intercourse increase, have more and more serious consequences for those whose interests are affected by it. It is also just as likely that mistakes in reference to domicile should give rise to damage to third parties; and these risks of damage can be more easily met by some general provision which shall protect bona fides, a subject we propose to bring under consideration when we come to discuss the question of legal capacity.¹⁶ But to all this we must add that the theory of residence or domicile, as it originated in the law of Rome, cannot be applied to the determination of personal law without important modifications, as we see in the practice of England and the United States, and sometimes, too, in that of Germany. Even when these modifications have been made, it is easy to lose oneself in capricious presumptions, while it is quite impossible to say that the interests of third parties are any better protected.

Domicile in the sense of the law of Rome is, with some isolated exceptions, entirely dependent on the caprice of the individual. That is not a convenient principle for the determination of personal law,¹⁷ although it may be sufficient for the determination of the general jurisdiction of courts over the person, and for all those occasions which the individual is free to regulate as he pleases. The State of origin has no right to prevent the individual from emigrating and attaching himself to another State. But that this may take place, we naturally must demand that there should be some process of adoption on the part of the other State.

Again, a part of the so-called personal law consists of regulations, the object of which is the permanent protection of the person, e.g. those statutes which are concerned with incapacity and with guardianship. Are we entitled to lay this permanent burden of protection upon any State in which the individual takes up his residence at his own good pleasure, ¹⁶ The law as to the acquisition or loss of nationality must not be established on any mistaken or onesided basis. Thus the pure principle of descent, if logically carried out, may easily result in error, if, for instance, a family who have continually for generations resided in one country, should still as foreigners be subjected, as regards their personal law, to the legal system of another country. To this extent Haus is quite right in his practical attack upon the principle of nationality. But the law as to nationality is capable of amendment; the principles on which domicile is dependent are not.

especially when this establishment of a residence is effected by a process that attracts very little attention, and requires but a short space of time for its accomplishment? On the other hand, the law of the family and the law of succession are in very close connection with national sympathies. Do we not do violence to the individual if we ascribe to domicile, which is often acquired quite unconsciously and without any particular purpose, a power of altering entirely the law of succession and of the family, without requiring some authentic declaration that the head of the family was bent upon such an alteration? Lastly, however, the domicile of foreigners in a country is a thing which the State of its own motion can bring to an end, as it can decree their expulsion. In the former edition of this book I disputed, and I was wrong in disputing, the possibility of a true domicile in cases in which the individual can be expelled from the place which he has selected for his domicile. This indefinite chance of expulsion, and of the consequent dissolution of domicile independently of the will of the individual, does not prevent the acquisition of domicile. But is it really possible that we should reasonably, in accordance with the principles of international law, attribute a permanent care for domiciled foreigners, and the right to regulate their succession and family law, to a State, which can at once banish any foreigner from its territories, a thing which, in many States, can be done by the simple scratch of a minister's pen, and for which he needs not so much as to assign a reason. The jurists of England and the United States, who have no knowledge of any such means of expulsion in their own countries, are apt to forget that the residence of foreigners in any territory has de jure to a large extent a precarious character. For this reason an expedient suggested by Westlake, in the deliberations of the Institute of International Law (Annuaire, v. p. 46), is inadequate. According to his view, a transportation of domicile to some other place should be accompanied by a formal declaration, to be registered under the authority of the Government. By this means a new intermediate class of foreigners (or of citizens?) would be created, and possibly the difficulties and doubts of the subject might be increased in other directions.¹⁸

We know that at present the jurisprudence of England and of the United States gives a decided negative to the proposal to determine these questions by the principle of nationality.¹⁹ Since there is but one nationality, i.e. citizenship, within the wide dominions of these respective empires, it must necessarily be that the law of the domicile, where there is such absolute freedom of migration, should rule; although, in order to be made available as a determinant of personal law, the doctrine of the Roman law of domicile must be subjected to important modifications. English and American jurists may therefore naturally regard it as an unnecessary complication to invoke and to develop a new doctrine, and one that is by no means easy, the doctrine of nationality, even for those cases in which non-Britains, or non-Americans, as the case may be, are concerned.

¹⁸ See Lorimer's answer to Westlake, i. p. 431. Such a voluntary registration would in most cases be neglected: men would put it off all their lives, just because they are not themselves certain about it.

¹⁹ In the Argentine Republic, too, the principle of domicile is uniformly the rule, i.e. the simple domicile of the Roman law, only modified by a few special rules. The intention is to attract and to assimilate foreigners as much as may be. Cf. Daireaux, Jour. xiii. pp. 290, 297, 298. In deciding the question whether any one has acquired a domicile in a place, the question of nationality is completely set aside.

THE PRINCIPLE OF NATIONALITY LIKELY EVENTUALLY TO PREVAIL.

§ 92. We believe, however, that the future will pronounce in favour of the principle of nationality.²⁰ Not only did the Institute of International Law in 1880²¹ declare itself in favour of it at its meeting in Oxford, but even among English jurists we find that the authority of Dicey,²² who has made the doctrine of domicile, with all its difficulties and incongruities, a matter of special investigation, describes the principle of nationality as the sound principle for future legislation. In Germany,²³ again, several specially prominent authors have expressed themselves in this sense,²⁴ and so, too, has the assembly of German jurists.^{25 26} It is admitted²⁷ that it is still frequently a matter of great difficulty to determine a person's

²⁰ Cf. Laurent, ii. § 60: "On a dit dans la discussion du code italien que le principe de nationalité fera le tour du monde. Telle est aussi ma conviction." All the authors who belong to the more modern school of French, Italian, or Belgian jurisprudence declare in favour of the principle of nationality. So, too, Brocher, Rev. iii. p. 431; Stoerk, Jour. vii. p. 336; v. Martens, § 69. Prof. G. König, too, in a pamphlet published in Basel in 1889, upon the Swiss law which regulates the mutual relations of settlers and residents, substantially adopted the principle of nationality. [So does Westlake to some extent, see § 256 ad fin.]

²⁴ The German Imperial tribunal, in a judgment of 9th June 1883 (Civil Sen. i.; Entsch. ix. No. 116, pp. 407, 408), says: "If we examine attentively German legislation and proposals for legislation in modern times, we remark a gradual tendency to place a higher value on the importance of that ideal link which is to be found in nationality." Goldschmidt, too, Handelsr. 2nd ed. § 38, note 2, who, as regards the existing law in so far as the common law of Germany is concerned, declares in favour of the principle of domicile, is of opinion that in future nationality, as its meaning comes more sharply into view, may establish itself as the regulative principle, in so far as the loss and the acquisition of the bond of citizenship are facilitated.

²⁷ In Switzerland there is now a strong movement on foot, which desires to set up the principle of domicile as a universal law of the Confederation, in place of the principle of nativity, i.e. determination by the fact of belonging to this or that canton (see Muheim on the literature of the subject, and the relative transactions of the union of Swiss jurists). The principle of nativity must, in the present day, when there is so much freedom of intercourse nationality. But these difficulties will be mitigated as legal systems are amended, and treaties are concluded, and as the [theory is more fully developed. On the other hand, the difficulties of ascertaining domicile cannot be lessened, because in this matter we have always to refer to an implied declaration of intention by the person concerned, and to take into computation his individual and peculiar habits of life. We may, indeed, affirm that these difficulties will even be increased by the speedier and wider intercourse and commerce of modern times. We see signs of this already in the fact that the more modern systems of law to a certain extent hold, in questions of jurisdiction, that a prolonged stay in some particular place, or the habit of making a stay there from time to time, may be treated on the same footing as a domicile.²⁸ We find evidence of the difficulties which the principle of domicile causes in questions of succession²⁹ in the English statutes on that subject of 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cc. 114 and 121). In the former of these statutes, the "domicile of origin" is quite arbitrarily put upon the same footing as the true domicile, in order to exclude any doubt as to the formal validity of a testament. In the latter, power is given to Government to provide, by means of treaties with other States, that the acquisition of a domicile by a British subject in any foreign State shall only be possible if combined with residence there for a year, and a written declaration to that effect: otherwise, as regards moveable succession, the former domicile shall be held to subsist.³⁰ V. Martens has recently (ii. p. 291) distinctly pronounced in favour of the principle of nationality. This is remarkable, because in his treatment of other questions of international law he is disposed rather to attach himself to the German school than to the French-Italian school.

among the little Swiss provinces, involve many practical inconveniences. But, as Muheim properly points out, these will more and more disappear, and, in place of them, the advantages of the principle of nationality become more and more apparent, the more uniform the constitution of the Swiss legal system is made. Muheim himself holds the principle of nationality, and, as far as Switzerland is at present concerned, the principle of nativity.

²⁸ Cf. e.g. the Civilprozessordnung for the German Empire, § 21. In my first edition, I pronounced in favour of nationality, but some people, e.g. Rosshirt, p. 333, did not fully understand my position, because I had to define for myself, in the condition in which the theory of the matter then stood, the idea of nationality. As I found this to be the right of residence in the State, for the sake of clearness I founded personal rights upon the right of residence, in place of making use of the term nationality, which at that time was quite indefinite. See my Opinion, in the Transactions of the 18th Conference of German Jurists, p. 95.

²⁹ The difficulties which are often associated with the ascertainment of domicile, are shown with particular clearness in Jour. i. p. 86, in the report of a decision of the Supreme Court of the State of New York. An invalid American lady lived ten years in Nice: in summer she travelled in Europe, for the winter she always returned to Nice, where she took rooms in a hotel for the whole year. It was said that she must be held to have meant to give up her domicile in America, as she could never hope to recover. The court, however, held that the American domicile continued to subsist. Cf. judgment of the court at Berlin, 2nd May 1867 (Seuff. 23, No. 3), and at Stuttgart 1862 (Seuff. 15, No. 184). We have also necessarily had to recognise the continued existence of a domicile that has been abandoned, in questions of personal law, if a new one has not been acquired. In this, however, we have wandered from the principles of the domicile of Roman law. See decision of the court at Stuttgart, of 14th April 1882 (Seuffert, 38, No. 203).

³⁰ Phillimore, iv. § 844; Foote, p. 22.

DOMICILE AN AUXILIARY GROUND FOR DETERMINATION: IN PARTICULAR IN CASES OF CONFLICT AMONG THE PARTICULAR LAWS PREVAILING WITHIN ONE AND THE SAME STATE.

§ 92A. There is no doubt that we may, and must, have recourse to domicile as an auxiliary principle for the determination of personal law. This is, of course, the case if we cannot demonstrate the nationality of the person in question;³¹ and, in the same way, if it is possible to hold that one and the same person has a plurality of nationalities, domicile must be the decisive consideration. Plurality of nationalities cannot be a common occurrence, except for some special circumstances, such as the case that several States can require the discharge of military duty from the same person. Domicile too may, in cases in which different legal systems are recognised within the territory of one State, be taken as the convenient rule for determining which of these systems is applicable. That will be so where the population enjoys complete freedom of movement and of settlement all over the territory,³² and laws of local citizenship enjoy accordingly a comparatively trifling importance. The same rule may indeed apply to the case of a confederation of States: if, for instance, the legislation of the German Empire should hereafter adopt the principle of nationality to regulate its relations with extra German States and legal systems, it might still be desirable to allow the principle of domicile to determine the personal law of individual citizens of the empire in the several federated States belonging to it, rather than the principle of birth or origin, which in questions of private law is fast losing ground as compared with domicile.³³ If, then, in modern times the effort in Switzer-

The rule of the most recent project for a Belgian code, art. 12, § 6 (Rev. xvi. p. 492), viz. "Celui qui ne justifie d'aucune nationalité a pour statut personnel la loi belge," is wrong, and scarcely possible to be carried out. Is that to be the rule if the person lives or trades in a foreign country? On the other hand, § 2 is quite properly conceived, viz.: "Il en est de même de celui qui appartient, à la fois, à la nationalité belge et à une nationalité étrangère." In so far as the Belgian judge is concerned, the application of the law of Belgium cannot be excluded by the fact that some other law declares itself to be the sole law applicable. Muheim, p. 123, proposes that where nationality cannot be determined, the lex loci actus should rule. But that cannot be justified on principle, and leads to singular results in practice.

³² I have already, on a former occasion, expressed myself to this effect (Münchener Kritische Vierteljahrschrift, vol. xv. pp. 19, 20).

land to stand for the future upon domicile,³⁴ in place of the municipal law of the canton, as has hitherto been the rule in the German cantons, gains more and more ground, it is quite compatible with the fact that the Swiss should in foreign countries be judged by the law of his nationality,³⁵ i.e. by the law of the last domicile which he or his parents had in Switzerland. But we are not here to set up a universal rule which shall suit alike all united and federated States. The question must always be settled by the domestic constitution of the particular federated State that is in question. Therefore the Oxford resolutions of the Institute of International Law are quite sound in saying:³⁶

“ Dans les cas où différentes lois coexistent dans un même état, les questions relatives à l'état et à la capacité de l'étranger seront décidées selon le droit intérieur de l'état auquel il appartient.”^{37 38}

DISTINCTIONS ACCORDING TO DIFFERENT LEGAL TOPICS.

§ 93. It may seem to be a question to what chapters or topics of law the principle of nationality is to be applied. The answer must simply be to this effect, that it is to be applied universally, where the application of a territorial law has to be associated with the permanent attachment of a person to some territory. Thus the law of nationality (i.e. the law of the State to which the person belongs) must decide not merely on questions of capacity, but also on questions of succession³⁹ to the estate of this person, on questions of his family law, and also on questions of guardianship.⁴⁰ my first edition. Olivi, too (Rev. xv. p. 217), recognises that domicile may be taken as a determinant of personal law, in so far as different laws prevail within one and the same territory.

³⁷ Annuaire, v. p. 57.

⁴⁰ This may be inferred to be the result of the Franco-Swiss treaty of 1869. Cf., too, Lehr, Jour. vi. p. 535, and Clunet, ibid. vii. p. 413. Martin (Jour. vi. p. 129) is of another opinion, and thinks that the law of the domicile and the courts of the domicile are more convenient. See, below, the doctrine of guardianship. Of course, the new Franco-Italian school takes the view of the text. Cf. Fiore, § 394; Durand, No. 186.

Nor can any distinction be drawn between the case of what are called coercitive laws and what are, on the other hand, called dispositive or permissive. It is just in matters affecting the law of succession and the family that Germans, French, Italians, Englishmen, etc., will cling most closely to the ideas that have been transmitted to them by descent: the law of succession is in close connection with that of the family, but the family again is the core of the State itself. Again, the law of guardianship is in close connection with the law of the family—indeed the father has a kind of guardianship over his minor children who are still under his potestas—while, on the other hand, it is a matter of interest for the State which is to guarantee the children a right of residence, and in case of their falling into pauperism is to receive and support them, to watch over their education and their property. To separate the so-called coercitive laws, which are not to be swayed by the will of the individual concerned, from the so-called permissive rules of law, would on the one hand result in intolerable confusion;⁴¹ while, on the other hand, its irrationality is obvious from the fact that the State, to which the persons in question belong, has a very pressing interest in keeping alive the national ideas of these its subjects even in matters of private law, and in the name of reciprocity must recognise that other States have a corresponding interest to regulate questions of succession and family law among their subjects, which have emerged within its jurisdiction. It is the confusion of the so-called permissive laws with an implied declaration of intention by the person—a confusion which we frequently observe⁴²—that has led to the exclusion of the permissive laws from the application of the law of the nationality. In interpreting implied intention, it may be quite right to have regard not to a person's national law, but to the law that prevails at his domicile, just as to the law of the place where the transaction has taken place, or the alleged declaration been made.

It may, however, be certainly laid down, that where a person carries on a business from some particular centre, he thereby impliedly refers all those with whom he trades to the law of that place. In so far, then, as it is possible for a party by a free exercise of will to subject himself to some particular foreign law,⁴³ to that extent the permissive law

⁴³ How far this is possible is a question for the law of the nationality. An example will make the case clear. A, who belongs to the State X, has in the State Y a trading establishment. The question whether A has any capacity to bind himself will be decided by the law of the State X, but all judgments as to the particular transactions concluded from the State Y must be determined by the law of Y.

that is recognised at the place where this business is established must prevail.⁴⁴

CONFLICTS.

§ 94. Lastly, what is to be the solution, if the laws of the two States that are concerned differ in this respect, that the one looks upon the law of the domicile as regulative of the legal question that is at issue, while the other holds the law of the nationality to be regulative?⁴⁵

Such a conflict may be positive, i.e. each of the two legal systems may claim right to decide the question in issue. Now every tribunal must defer, in questions of international law, to the law of the State to which it belongs: the decision of the tribunal cannot therefore be doubtful, if each of the two systems claims the case for its own decision. But if the courts of both countries actually do determine the question, there will result a conflict of decisions which the resources of science cannot solve. In such a case, each of the conflicting judgments must be carried into execution so far as the jurisdiction of each of the States extends.

But what shall be the result if, conversely, the legal system of the State in which the person has his domicile holds that nationality must determine the question, while the system of the other, whose nationality he enjoys, says that the law of the domicile shall rule? For instance, the law of England holds the law of divorce to be dependent on the domicile of the spouses; the law of Belgium, on the other hand, holds it to depend on their nationality. Labbé⁴⁶ notes that a decision might be put upon the ground of the theory, which recognises the application of the lex fori as the ruling principle in international law, and refers the application of any other rules of law to considerations of convenience merely: in the case we have put there are no such considerations, as it is the foreign law itself which declines to exercise its jurisdiction: there is then, it may be said, nothing for it but the simple application of the lex fori. Labbé, however, who appeals to Laurent on this point, rejects this solution. The native system of law can only justify its competency, he thinks, on legal grounds,

I think now, however, that it would be better to delete the former of these rules, for the doctrine of the text is not applicable to any commercial transaction, but merely to one that is concluded by a trading firm.

and all the legal rules known to it point to its incompetency: the judge cannot, on consideration of convenience, adopt the theory of some foreign legal system as to international law. It is, however, as I think, unnecessary to fall back on that theory of the lex fori, and an evasion of it by a sort of comitas. What in truth is implied in the system of law, which makes the law of the person dependent on his domicile instead of on his nationality? Simply this, that this system holds that in the sphere of private law there is no such thing to be recognised in the technical sense as nationality. As, then, the person in question has no nationality in the other State claiming to regulate his private legal relations, the case is just the same as if he had had no nationality at all. The only competent law is therefore that of the domicile. This result is in a practical view the best, and, so far as actual decisions are known to me, has been adopted in practice, although perhaps on other grounds, which I must regard as mistaken.⁴⁷

The opposite view, which is supported by Labbé, lands us in the purely negative, and therefore undesirable result, that the persons concerned cannot get any decision on the point; whereas a reference to the law of the domicile will produce a decision which the other State also must recognise, and all the more so, as it is hardly possible that this latter State should ⁴⁷ Cf. the two judgments discussed by Labbé at p. 13; the judgment of the French Court of Cassation of 5th May 1875; and that of the Court of Brussels of 14th May 1881: an appeal against the latter was refused. In a case which was decided by the Supreme Court of Appeal at Lübeck, on 21st March 1861 (cf. Seuffert, xiv. No. 107), the suit came to depend in the country the nationality of which had been enjoyed by the deceased, and in which the rule of determining succession by the law of the domicile was the prevailing rule. The Supreme Court held that the law of the nationality, the law of Frankfurt, which was also the lex fori, must rule. In this way, recognition was given to a kind of reference or delegation to the other law, it being always assumed that the law of the domicile really had the force which it was represented to have. The reasons for the judgment are untenable, viz.: "If the common principle is followed out, as it should be, it requires that the law which prevails at the domicile of the deceased should be applied in its totality, and the succession therefore should be treated exactly as it would have been, if it had fallen to the courts of the domicile to deal with it." This leads to a circulus inextricabilis, to an unending reference from the one law to the other. Decisions of the German court on this point may be found in Bolze (Praxis, ii. No. 20, p. 5, and iii. No. 28). In their results we must agree—results by which the law of the domicile, which was also the lex fori, was declared to be the rule—the reasons for them, however, involve a circulus inextricabilis. In the first of these decisions it is said that, although the law of Baden will not withdraw the regulation of an estate left by the citizen of some foreign country who was domiciled in Baden from the rules of the foreign law in question, yet the law of Baden must be applied, if the foreign law itself prescribes that it should. Cf., too, Court of Toulouse, 22nd May 1880, Jour. viii. p. 61; if the national law of a foreigner who has died provides that his succession shall be regulated by the law of his actual domicile, and this domicile is in France, the law of France will rule his moveable estate, although in ordinary cases a domicile in fact receives no consideration in the law of France. The revised statute book for Zurich of 1887, § 3, gives the proper decision, viz.: "The family relations of foreigners domiciled in the canton will be settled by the law of their home, in so far as the law of the State to which they belong prescribes this." § 4 makes the same provision for succession. The origin of the idea is from Bluntschli. More recent judicial decisions seem to have misinterpreted it. (See, on the other hand, Schneider, comm. on § 4, No. 2.) There will probably be some alteration after the revised code is published, as the revisers did not approve of the view taken in these decisions.

reserve for its own courts an exclusive jurisdiction to decide questions, the merits of which must be determined according to the law of the domicile.

III. EQUALITY OF FOREIGNERS AND NATIVE SUBJECTS BEFORE THE LAW.

THE PRINCIPLE OF THIS EQUALITY.

§ 95. We have already noticed that law in the Middle Ages does not by any means bear the same exclusive character, or deny foreigners equal treatment in the same way, as we know it did in many nations in more ancient times. In the later Middle Ages, it is true that the development of some particular systems of law moved in an opposite direction, and in many cases there were instances of serious disadvantages of the most selfish description being imposed on foreigners; but the later commentators even declared that, as a matter of principle—so far as there were no special exceptions created by law or statute—foreigners and native subjects in the sphere of private law enjoyed the same recognition from the law.^{1 2} This, too, is the principle³ of the common law of Rome,⁴ and of the various local German systems.^{5 6} With regard to the acquisition of real property, however, limitations on the legal capacity of foreigners were common up to the most recent times, and foreigners, too, are frequently subject to what is known as "Ausländer-arrest" (arrestments, or foreigners' attachment), and to the obligation to find caution for expenses.⁷ These two regulations are not, however, any real inequality in legal capacity, but are rather a special

¹ Cf. e.g. Baldus, in L. Si non speciali, 9, num. 2, C. de testamentis; Barthol, de Saliceto, in L. Cunctos, C. de S. Trin. num. 8. Laurent, i. § 207, combats this, but he is mistaken.

² The proposition must, however be restricted to this, that they have the like capacity for acquiring all rights. That does not involve that they shall be treated absolutely alike. The consequence of that would be, that the law recognised in the territory of the court which was dealing with the case, would always be applied.

³ See Fiore, § 11, as to the development of this principle.

⁴ Cf. e.g. Mevius, Ad Jus Lub. Proleg. qu. 4, § 37; Walter, D. Privatr. § 60; Mittermaier, D. Privatr. 6th ed. § 109; Hofæker, de effie. § 23, and authors cited there; Oppenheim, Völkerr. p. 357; Bülow and Hagemann, Prakt. Erörterungen, ix. pp. 142, 143; Spangenberg, in Linde's Zeitschrift für Civilr und Process, iii. p. 431; Feuerbach, Themis, p. 325; Maurenbrecher, D. Privatr. 2nd ed. § 141; Judgment of the Supreme Court at Berlin of the 26th September 1849 (Dec. xviii. p. 148); Preuss. A. L. R. §§ 41-44 of the introduction; Pr. Allgem. Gerichtsord. i. 50, § 162; Supreme Court of Berlin, 16th July 1857 (Striethorst, xxvi. p. 139); Austrian Civil Code, § 33; Saxon Civil Code; Wächter, i. pp. 252, 253; Bopp, in Weiske's Rechtslexicon, iv. pp. 359, 360; Stobbe, § 43.

⁶ In the Argentine Republic, the principle is proclaimed at the very beginning of the constitution (Daireaux, Jour. xiii. p. 418).

⁷ [By the common law of England and Scotland, aliens were under various disabilities, e.g. were incapable of purchasing or taking by succession heritable property; but by 33 Vict. c. 14, this and various other disabilities are removed: aliens are still incapable of exercising privilege given to the other litigant,—in consequence of the fact that the foreigner can more easily withdraw himself from the tribunals of this country—by means of which he can protect himself against the risk of legal process being in that way defeated.⁸ Political rights are denied to foreigners everywhere. They imply a share in the government of the State, which cannot be exercised unless there is a permanent obligation to loyalty.

The right, too, of carrying on trade and commerce is at the present day generally conceded to foreigners: there are, however, exceptions of various kinds recognised in the case of trades.^{9 10}

In England, a longer period was required for the full recognition of the principle of equality: it has, however, been fully recognised by the statute of 1870, that foreigners can acquire English real property and can inherit it.¹¹ In the United States, we still in some States find this limitation, that none but residents in the country can own real property. This rule has, however, very little to do with the old-fashioned disabilities of foreigners.

political rights—the statute is declared not to qualify an alien for any office, or for any municipal, parliamentary, or other franchise: nor can an alien be owner or part owner of a British ship, or in Scotland be appointed tutor or curator. In Scotland, a litigant resident furth of Scotland must, as a condition of suing in Scotland, sist a mandatory to be responsible to the court for the proper conduct of the case, and to the opposite party for expenses. But see infra, § 401.]

⁸ Unger, i. p. 303.

⁹ Strangers must be denied all rights, which, without being in truth political, i.e. implying a certain share in the government of the State, or of the community, assume in their nature a permanent attachment to it. For instance, foreigners can never claim that in school instruction any regard should be given to their language: they have no concern in such matters. But, as we have noticed, these things may be otherwise ordered in the relations of federated States. Here it seems conceivable that members of the federation should be admitted to political rights in one of the federated States to which they do not, however, belong.

¹⁰ It generally depends on the discretion of the State to what extent it shall impose duties on foreigners. It settles conditions for the residence of foreigners. It may not, however, make sudden and excessive changes on its rules, to the prejudice of foreigners already domiciled and in violation of good faith, or impose duties which in the end may give occasion to a breach of the loyalty due by the residents to their own country, e.g. a duty to serve in the army, in place of a mere obligation to serve in some kind of police force. Where a residence has lasted for some time (five years perhaps), the children of foreigners may very well be declared to be under obligation to attend school, or receive education otherwise, as a condition of being allowed to continue to reside. For the presence of a number of totally uneducated foreigners in the country may be a serious matter. Cf. Laurent, viii. § 101. He, however, certainly goes too far in this matter.

On the subject of school attendance, reference may be made to the Convention entre la France et la Suisse en vue d'assurer la fréquentation des écoles primaires par les enfants des deux pays résidant sur le territoire de l'autre pays, dated 14th December 1887, and published in France by a decree of 13th June 1888 (printed in J. xv. p. 857). In accordance with it, children of Swiss nationality will be treated in France, and children of French nationality will be treated in Switzerland, as regards the duty of attendance at school and the indispensability of elementary education, on the same footing as children of native subjects. The person, with whom the children are being brought up, may be made responsible for their attendance at school. Such treaties are to be recommended, if the system of instruction rests upon somewhat similar principles in both countries. A system of a strictly denominational kind will, it must be admitted, generally prove an obstacle to such measures.

¹¹ [See note 7, supra.] Phillimore, iv. § 385.

A foreigner, who acquires property by inheritance, may retain its value. He must, however, dispose of it within a certain time, and the exclusion of foreigners from the rights of landed proprietors is maintained merely on the ground that the accumulation of great tracts of land in the hands of foreigners is considered dangerous.¹²

In reference to the capacity of foreigners to enjoy legal rights, a retrograde movement has begun in a number of countries. But it is only in Russia that the movement has, as yet, resulted in rules of law of positive disadvantage to foreigners. According to the text of statutes which have been published in the newspapers, foreigners in Russia seem to be more and more excluded from the right of owning property in land, or holding manufactories, etc. History will show who has been the means of originating this retrograde movement, and who will have to bear the consequences if it continues.

CIVIL AND NATURAL RIGHTS.

§ 96. It is strange, but true, that the Code Civil constructed under the first empire has taken as a fundamental principle, in contradiction of the cosmopolitan ideas which prevailed at the outset of the Revolution, an erroneous theory by which the legal equality of foreigners is limited. The result is the 11th article of the Code Civil, which only allows the foreigner in France the enjoyment of droits civils,¹³ in so far as the country of that foreigner allows Frenchmen the same rights, and guarantees them by public treaties. Other foreigners are, therefore, excluded from this privilege; they seem to be capable of enjoying those rights only which have been described, in the sense of a well-known theory of natural law, as droits naturels.¹⁴ No definition, however, is given either of droits civils or droits naturels: there are particular rights which, as droits civils, are expressly denied to foreigners by French legislation; at the same time, a more exact investigation shows that the distinction taken in the Code Civil is upon the whole completely untenable in theory, and practically useless.¹⁵

¹² Wharton, § 17. The Court of Appeal of New York (Luhrs v. Timer, 1880, Jour. viii. 279) held that the real estate of an American citizen, i.e. a naturalised citizen, who had died intestate, did not fall to his father, who would have succeeded in the ordinary course, in respect that the father was an alien: a sister, who had been naturalised by marriage, was preferred. Wharton, Dig. ii. § 201 (p. 490), cites from a dispatch of Secretary Adams in 1827, the principle that the rule of treating foreigners and natives on an absolutely equal footing, as regards all subjects of commerce and navigation, "is altogether congenial to our institutions." Limitations on the right of succession to real property are gradually being removed in most of the States. Besides that, these limitations have been entirely removed as regards the whole territory of the Union, in so far as the subjects of some foreign States are concerned. See Wharton, Dig. ii. p. 495.

¹⁴ See, as to the diverse interpretation placed on article 11, Durand, § 106.

¹⁵ Brocher, i. p. 164, remarks very truly: "Les droits les plus naturels ont besoin d'une réglementation et peuvent sembler difficiles à classer."

There are certain rules of law, especially those which are concerned with ordinary commercial intercourse, which are alike among all civilised peoples. In spite of that, the idea of a law which is originally entirely independent of any recognition of it by particular States must be pronounced to be a mistake; this can easily be shown by examples. Nothing, for instance, appears more natural to the universal legal conscience than that bargains, in whatever form they may be concluded, should be observed. Many kinds of bargains and contracts, however, have some special form prescribed for them by positive enactment: such forms are undoubtedly to be reckoned as belonging to the droit civil, if any rules at all are to be considered as distinguishable from natural law. These forms of contracts, therefore, will have no application to intercourse with foreigners. But a French author or a French court of law will hardly be found to lay down that in a case where writing is required by French law to complete a contract, this rule is not to be applied to contracts concluded by foreigners with Frenchmen in France. Roman law, no doubt, as we have seen, recognised such a jus gentium common to foreigners and Romans, and this idea was justified if the foreigner was only to be recognised as having legal capacity in reference to certain definite branches of law. But if we assume, as the legal mind of the present day does, that foreigners in matters of private law are not to be placed at a disadvantage with citizens, a distinction of the kind loses all definite meaning, and results at last in an arbitrary oppression of foreigners. As a matter of fact, even in French jurisprudence the greatest conflict prevails over the division of the different rules of the law into these two classes,¹⁶ and at last, in theory at least, the proper rule has been adopted, that by the law of France foreigners as a rule enjoy droits civils, and all rights which the law has not expressly denied them.¹⁷ By reason of traditional usage,¹⁸ many other private rights¹⁹ are denied or disputed in the case of foreigners.²⁰ The Codes of Holland and of Italy, although in so many respects they rest upon that of France, have dropped this distinction. The Italian Code in its third article categorically declares: "Lo straniero è ammesso a godere dei diritti civili attribuiti ai cittadini."²¹

¹⁶ See Rosshirt in his Zeitschrift für Civil. und Criminalr. iii. p. 335; and especially Savigny, Syst. ii. p. 154.

²⁰ Of special importance are the 726th and 912th articles of the Code, which limit the capacity of foreigners to succeed.

²¹ The present Dutch Code is to the same effect, art. 9. See Asser, Rev. i. p. 113.

If we desire nations to have free intercourse with each other, we must pronounce in favour of the liberal principles of these later statute books.²² That foreigners should not be equally recognised by the law, and should be put at a disadvantage with native subjects, gives an element of uncertainty to all intercourse, prevents full use being made of the capital and industrial resources of foreigners, and, lastly, operates to the loss of all mankind, as it is only by freedom of movement and certainty of intercourse that the globe can be occupied to the fullest advantage.²³

SYSTEM OF RECIPROCITY ?

§ 97. These considerations lead us to reject the system of reciprocity ;²⁴ they will prevent us from making the equality of foreigners with subjects in the eye of the law, at least as a general rule, dependent upon whether the State to which the foreigner belongs gives our subject the same rights,²⁵ or, to speak more correctly, treats the subject of our State in the particular case like its own. The advantage to be derived from a favourable treatment of foreigners, a treatment that suits the nature of the circumstances, is above all other considerations, and as a general rule we should not make that which is sound in principle depend upon whether other States also adopt this sound view, since it is precisely by such limitations of sound principles that their beneficial results are laid open to dispute, and thrown into the shade.²⁶

A system of reciprocity is in practice less hurtful, if all that is required of the other country is that our citizens shall receive a practically equal ²² See Phillimore, iv. § 385 ; v. Martens, ii. § 69.

²⁴ It is defended by Haus, p. 52. On the other hand, see the excellent exposition of Hamaker, Das internationale Privatrecht, pp. 12, 13, and art. 9 of the Dutch statute book of 1838 : this article reserves power to make exceptions, but a close examination shows that this does not require to be expressed. It is more correct not to set up such exceptions by any general article, but to enact them simply as the different subjects to which they refer are taken up. In that way it is more probable that the exceptions will be confined to the cases in which they are really required, i.e. that the foreigner will be placed at a disadvantage to the native subject only in so far as his foreign character is really an objection to an equal treatment by the law. See, too, Fusinato, Introduzione, p. 55.

treatment.²⁷ But such a system is specially mischievous, if, as is the case in the 11th article of the Code Civil, the treatment of foreigners is made to depend upon reciprocity being guaranteed by international treaties. By that means a satisfactory state of the law maintained by practice and usage is undermined, to make way for a vague prospect of international treaties, the conclusion of which is dependent on all sorts of accidents, and the conception of which is frequently by no means unobjectionable.

It may, no doubt, as an exceptional case, be practically useful to make a State feel in its own experience the effects of some of its own rules of law, that it is in a very high degree unjust in placing foreigners at a disadvantage, or in expressing an unfounded distrust of our administration of justice; and in an extreme case the rule of material reciprocity may be applied.²⁸ The latter course is justified if the foreign rule of law makes, in so far as formal expression goes, no distinction between natives and foreigners generally, or between natives and subjects of our State, as the case may be, while its sting is aimed at foreigners, because its own subjects can very rarely find themselves in the position contemplated by it, or if the non-reciprocity gives foreigners generally an advantage as against our subjects in legal relations.²⁹ This exceptional prejudicial treatment of the subjects of particular States should not, however, be the direct result of a general enactment, but should proceed upon some special statute, or upon an ordinance of the Government, for which provision has been made in the general statute. Retaliation, then, can be justified, but any system of reciprocity must absolutely be rejected, as having practically a retrograde tendency.

Further, it may, as an exceptional measure, be justifiable to exclude foreigners absolutely from certain rights, and without any reference to the treatment of our citizens in foreign countries, if it can with good reason be maintained that the exercise of the rights in question require certain guarantees, which it is hardly possible for a foreigner to give us. In matters of private law,³⁰ and even in the sphere of commercial law, presumptions are very decidedly against such exceptions, and it is

³⁰ As a rule, it is only true political rights that should be denied to foreigners. It seems, for instance, at first quite proper that it should be impossible for a foreigner to be adopted by citizens of our State (Judgment of the Court of Cassation at Paris, 5th August 1823; Sirey, unworthy of a State, which has any feeling of confidence in its own existence, to be anxious on such a point.

If, however, the principle of reciprocity in the sphere of material private law is to be retained, it is proper, just because, in spite of possible exceptions, the whole of our modern international intercourse rests, as a matter of principle, on the legal capacity of foreigners, to require proof of the inequality by which our subjects are alleged to be affected in any other country, i.e. in doubt to assume that their treatment is the same.³¹ That is the meaning of the 20th section of the Saxon statute book, whereas the Austrian statutes express the contrary presumption, although, as a matter of practice, it is never acted on.³² Notice may no doubt be given by the legislature, that the presumption will be reversed in exceptional cases, in the case of rules of law in connection with which foreigners are frequently put at a disadvantage out of their own country, or where recognition is frequently arbitrarily refused to the legal proceedings of another State. This holds good in particular for many of the rules of the law of process.

RIGHTS WHICH WERE ORIGINALLY PRIVILEGES. RIGHT TO A PARTICULAR NAME.

§ 98. There are further rights attached to a man's personality, which were originally regarded not as rights but as privileges, by which the natural freedom of the rest of the population of the State was limited. To this class belong the rights of copyright and of invention, and the right to the protection of trade-marks. In this department it might seem to be more doubtful whether full legal capacity should de plano be extended to foreigners. But the more the first origin of these rights is forgotten by the different nations, and the more they are, accordingly, set upon the same level as other rights, the less is it possible that they should be denied to foreigners as such. On the other hand, rights of this kind are here and there looked upon as privileges of native industry, and, according to this view, the question as to the personality of him who claims them is not so important as the question of the locality in which his privileged activity first comes into play. To this subject we shall return hereafter.

The right, too, of bearing a particular name must be conceded to foreigners to the same extent as to native subjects, but to no other or greater xxiii. 1, p. 353). It is found, however, to be of no importance, when we remember that foreigners are allowed to set up great trading establishments, and so to exercise considerable influence over a large number of persons. In the view of the majority of French jurists (Massé, ii. p. 32), foreigners cannot be witnesses to legal solemnities in France. It is, however, obvious to the legal conscience of the present day that it is unjust to regard the capacity of bearing witness as a political privilege.

³¹ Norsa, p. 261, and the judgments of the Court of Cassation at Turin, of 30th April 1862, and 13th September 1870, cited by him.

extent, and in so far as our law gives him who has a right to any name an action to prevent unauthorised persons from bearing it, we must allow foreigners a like right.³³ Even the law of France holds this, because it looks upon the right to a name, or to a firm, as a droit naturel.³⁴ But if a foreigner in his own country has acquired right to bear some particular name in accordance with its laws, and that may be by simply having used it, he cannot, on sound principles, be forbidden in our country to bear this name.³⁵ Because the right to a particular name is an exclusive right in this sense only, that no one may bear it unless he has a title to do so. But this right can never ensure that the same name shall not occur elsewhere; and how could the case of two claimants, each of whom could with justice appeal to the unforeseen event, be decided? The right to carry a particular name can hardly be regarded as anything but a personal statute which will have an extra-territorial effect; on the other hand, it may be that the rights of the native of one country may stand in the way of the claim of some foreigner to bear a particular name.

RIGHTS TO res nullius. FISHERY RIGHTS. PROPERTY IN SEA-GOING SHIPS.

§ 99. Vattel (ii. § 88) considers the capacity to acquire things that have no owner as an exclusive privilege of the native citizen. According to his conception, such things are a common property of the natives that has been left in the original common stock unappropriated, and therefore no foreigner has any part in it. He will not, therefore, allow a foreigner the rights of the chase in countries where these are free; and maintains that a foreigner who finds a treasure does not acquire any property in it, although a citizen in the same circumstances would do so. But the conception of a thing that has no owner excludes any special right in any one, and excludes, therefore, a common right in all citizens. Accordingly, unless foreigners are expressly excluded from acquiring anything at all by occupation, the acquisition of things that have no owners must also be granted to them. But if, as is generally the case with sporting rights, there is in any particular privileged person—be this the body of citizens or not—an exclusive right of occupation, the foreigner cannot make any use of the right, which he undoubtedly has, of acquiring property in a thing that has no owner by occupation, a circumstance which may explain Vattel's notion. So long, however, as foreigners are not excluded either by statute or by custom, the right of occupation may be as competently exercised by foreigners as by citizens.

³³ See judgment of the Court of Dijon, of 13th July 1885, Jour. xii. p. 301, and Laurent, iii. § 355.

³⁴ See judgment of the Court of Dijon (last note), and judgment of the Court of Cassation of 5th Jan. 1861 there cited.

Every State, however, is entitled to declare that fishings on its coasts, and the right of navigation round these coasts, is an exclusive right of its own subjects.³⁶ In modern times, many treaties have been concluded with a view to settle the boundaries of such exclusive rights of fishing in the subjects of different countries. We may, however, commit the subject to public law in the proper sense rather than to private international law. We have only this further remark to make, that even those legal systems which allow foreigners in other matters full legal rights as regards private law, exclude them from the acquisition of national ships, or at least allow foreigners to have only partial rights of property in their sea-going ships.³⁷ This exception, however, is only one in appearance. The acquisition of the property, in so far as it is not merely the acquisition of a share in the ship,³⁸ and is not at once followed by a re-transmission to some subject of the country, is not for all that a nullity. All that is lost is the right to carry the national flag, and to carry the national flag without proper authority involves penalties, so that in many systems of law it becomes necessary that any share in a ship, which by succession, or in any other way, has fallen to one who does not belong to the nation, should be disposed of to some subject of that nation.³⁹ The matter simply stands thus: A ship of a particular national character is to some extent a part of the State itself—it is so certainly on the high seas—and the State must take care of its own, and has a certain responsibility for a ship sailing under its flag. The owner, again, has to represent the ship in matters of private law. In this way, there is a necessity that the nationalities of the ship and its owners should be the same.

After what has been said, we may describe the rule which the Institute

³⁷ Cf. Perels, Internationales Scerecht, p. 55; and R. Wagner, Handbuch des Scerechts, i. § 19. [The Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, provides (§§ 62-64) that if any one who is not qualified to own a British ship, i.e. (§ 18) who is not either a natural-born British subject, or who has obtained letters of denization or naturalisation, or a body corporate subject to the laws of and having its principal place of business in the United Kingdom or in some British possession, succeeds, in the event of death or marriage, to a title to a British ship, application may be made to the Court for an order to sell the ship or the shares in her, and if the application is not made within the time, the property thus transmitted is forfeited to the Crown. § 103, subsec. 3, provides that if any unqualified person acquires as owner in any other way any interest, either legal or beneficial, in a ship using a British flag, and assuming the British character, such interest or property shall be forfeited to Her Majesty. See MacLachlan on Shipping, p. 70.]

³⁹ See, on this case, especially Wagner, i. p. 158.

of International Law⁴⁰ adopted in 1880 as practically worthy of recommendation, and even already adapted to the legal systems of most civilised States. It is, "L'étranger quelle que soit sa nationalité ou sa religion jouit des mêmes droits civils que le régnicole, sauf les exceptions formellement établies par la législation actuelle."⁴¹

RIGHT OF RESIDENCE IN THE COUNTRY. EXPULSION OF FOREIGNERS.⁴²

§ 100. Lastly, it is obvious that the capacity and the rights of foreigners must be different from those of the native subject, in the respect in which foreigners are distinguished from subjects: it is only the subject who has a complete right to live and reside in the State (see § 54 supra), whereas foreigners may be expelled or refused admission.⁴³ By that statement, of course, we do not mean that foreigners may be expelled⁴⁴ on purely arbitrary grounds.⁴⁵ It is very soundly said in a dispatch of Mr Everett, a Secretary of State in the United States in 1852, that "this Government could never give up the right of excluding foreigners whose presence they might deem a source of danger to the United States." But a statement of Mr Secretary Evarts in 1879 is just as sound, viz.: "... yet the manner of carrying out such asserted right may be highly objectionable. You would be fully justified in making earnest remonstrance should a citizen of the United States be expelled without just steps to assure the grounds of such expulsion" (Wharton, Dig. 2, § 206, pp. 516 and 518). In an absolute sense, no doubt, the State

⁴⁰ Annuaire, v. p. 56.

⁴¹ But no State is denied the right of making exceptions for some particular nationalities, e.g. from excluding coloured races from the acquisition of certain rights.

⁴² As a rule, this doctrine of expulsion, a doctrine which upon the whole is much neglected, is only dealt with in treatises on public law: an arbitrary expulsion is simply regarded as an insult to the State to which the expelled person belongs. But such an expulsion affects very deeply the private legal interests of that person. It belongs, therefore, on the one hand, to the sphere of private international law, and an injustice so inflicted is not removed by the failure of the State to which the injured person belongs, from weakness or from connivance, to raise any objections. No doubt the person unjustly expelled has no right of action, or right to damages, if his own State does not obtain the latter for him.

⁴³ Even in Italy, in spite of the equal legal capacity of foreigners of which so much is said as a principle, there is no doubt that they may be expelled for special reasons. See Gianzana, i. § 79.

⁴⁵ See the author's paper in Jour. xiii. p. 1, on "l'expulsion des étrangers."

can close its territory to foreigners.⁴⁶ But if it opens its frontiers to them, and gives them an implied invitation to reside in its territory, either itself keeping up all sorts of means of communication with foreign countries, or allowing others to establish such means, if it permits them to carry on trades there, to acquire property, and to make costly improvements on it, it would be nothing short of a violation of the bona fides which must be observed in international intercourse,⁴⁷ if it was then suddenly and arbitrarily to expel all foreigners, and in fact compel them to sell, perhaps at great loss, their property, and to break up the commercial and family connection which they had formed. We cannot, therefore, approve of an absolute, unrestrained, and arbitrary power of expulsion.

§ 101. We must, then, require that there should be some grounds for the expulsion. As a rule, these can only be found, 1st, in the poverty of the person expelled; 2nd, in some crime which he has committed, or contemplated, i.e. for which he has made preparations, inasmuch as this will show that he is dangerous to the public safety;⁴⁸ 3rd, in disobedience to the law; 4th, in the fact that he remains in the country, although he has expatriated himself and has acquired a foreign nationality, or has exercised an option in favour of another nationality in order to evade the law, and to avoid the burdens which the State imposes on its subjects; and 5th, in the fact that the individual cannot show any particular nationality, but yet refuses to acquire nationality in the State where he is, in order to withdraw himself from the duties of a subject, especially the obligation of military service. It is also a sixth ground, and one that has long been recognised, that a State has a right to exclude the subjects of another State with which it is at war. It cannot be disputed that possibly the security of the State, and even the security of the subjects of the hostile State themselves, may require some such measure; but very frequently it will be a mere useless piece of harshness, which may injure in very many ways the State which adopts it.⁴⁹ It is obvious that, where the reason for

⁴⁶ E.g. can forbid criminals or persons in need of support from the poor law to be introduced. See Wharton, Dig. ii. § 206, on the attempts by the United States to adopt justifiable means of protection of this kind. The statute of the United States of 26th February 1885 (given by Wharton at p. 526) against the immigration and importation of persons who are already under contracts of service, is, as a matter of public law, unobjectionable. [See this right of exclusion affirmed by the Privy Council in the case of Musgrove v. Chun Teong Toy, A. C. [1891] 272, at least to the effect of refusing an alien a right of action to compel admission.]

⁴⁹ V. Mohl, who at the outset is a strenuous upholder of the right of foreigners to reside, proposes to allow the expulsion of foreigners, putting aside a power of exclusion, on account of the expulsion is some crime that was committed before the person entered the State, or some crime that has been committed within that territory, it must be a more serious one if it is to justify the expulsion of a person who is domiciled, than it need be in the case of a person who has only a passing residence within the territory.⁵⁰

To supplement the material reasons for expulsion, we shall require also certain formal guarantees which are still wanting in the legislation and the practice of most of the States of the Continent of Europe. In the first place, the person who is to be expelled must receive intimation of the reasons for his expulsion.⁵¹ If a State refuses to assign reasons for it, this important measure is made to wear at least the appearance of an act of arbitrary administration. Again, in every case in which the expulsion is based upon the individual conduct of the particular person, and there is no general regulation in question, as there would be where war was threatening or had broken out, there must be a right of appeal, either to a higher court, an administrative court,⁵² or to another cognate official body, which would be in a position to take proof on the facts which may have been assigned as conditions for the expulsion. If there is a threatened outbreak of disturbances, the Government must for convenience be allowed any unreasonable or unlawful purposes, if there is good ground for supposing that they will disturb the public peace, or interfere with the pursuit by the State of its own objects. The clause which we have italicised is, however, either superfluous, if the objects of the State are expressed in its legislation or can be reached by means of it, or the effect of it is to justify any arbitrary acts. For, in a case of expulsion, there is always some object that can be cited to support it.

⁵⁰ We must on this subject remember that, according to the older view, no domiciled persons were looked upon as foreigners, and consequently such persons were not liable to expulsion as foreigners. Fiore, Diritto intern. pubblico, i. p. 528, calls attention to a Danish law of 15th May 1875, which makes the distinction between foreigners who are and foreigners who are not domiciled, which we have noticed in the text. The Belgian statute of 6th February 1885, art. 2, excludes from liability to expulsion "celui qui a été autorisé à établir son domicile dans le royaume, celui qui s'est marié avec une femme Belge, dont il a un ou plusieurs enfants nés en Belgique pendant sa résidence, celui qui, marié avec une femme Belge a fixé sa résidence en Belgique depuis plus de cinq ans et a continué à résider, d'une manière permanente."

On the distinction between the power of expulsion as regards domiciled and non-domiciled foreigners, see Suliotis, Jour. xiv. pp. 431, 432, who, in this connection, says of the Roumanian law of 7th April 1881: "L'abus qu'on a fait de cette loi exceptionnelle rappelle les temps de l'ostracisme Athénien et la xénelasié Lacédémonienne."

⁵¹ France has concluded a series of treaties in which it is made a condition that the subjects of the contracting parties shall not be expelled except for weighty reasons, and that these reasons shall be communicated to the consul or other diplomatic representative of the State as well as to the person himself, that, if possible, they may be met: e.g. a treaty with Bavaria of 30th May 1868, with Bolivia, etc. (cf. Durand, p. 515). This provision is also in force for the German Empire, by reason of the most favoured nation clause of the treaty of Frankfort, art. 11. The 11th article of the police regulations of 17th April 1885, for Bosnia and Herzegovina, provides similarly that written intimation of the reasons of expulsion shall always be given to the person who is expelled.

to expel all foreigners, from whom they have any reason to fear a breach of the public peace, without allowing in that case any right of appeal.

The question of the right to expel foreigners from the territory (upon which Rolin-Jacquemyns' paper in Rev. xx. p. 498 may be consulted) was in 1888 taken up as a subject of discussion by the Institute of International Law, but has not as yet been fully disposed of. At the same time, proceeding upon the view that while no State could altogether renounce its right of expelling foreigners, this measure, which of course presses very severely on individuals, should not be employed capriciously, or without certain protective guarantees both in form and substance, the meeting, adopting the report of a Committee,⁵³ were at one in approving of some preliminary resolutions, the sense of which is as follows.

Certain distinctions must be made. A. We have first to deal with expulsion in pressing cases, where despatch is urgent, i.e. expulsion in time of war or of serious riots. A sentence of expulsion of this kind may go out against particular individuals and entire classes. It was thought that the Government or the Police must in such cases have a freer hand, just because the matter is one of immediate peril of a more general description than is usual. In such cases, therefore, the guarantees afforded by the necessity of convoking courts of law or administrative bodies are out of place. Just as little is there any possibility of having the character of individuals investigated by the court, to see if they be native subjects or foreigners, in case there be doubt about it. On the other hand, a measure of this kind, which is only intended to meet passing dangers, should have no more than a temporary operation, it being always possible to convert it into one of the other two kinds of expulsion, if the conditions necessary for doing so are present.

B. Extraordinary measures of expulsion directed exclusively against whole classes, and not against individuals. As is well known, it has been asserted in very recent times that, under certain circumstances, a State may find itself forced into the position of adopting a general measure of expulsion against foreign elements which are pressing in upon it, and threaten to swamp it. The Institute refrained from laying down any material limitations for such large measures as this, which can only receive final judgment from history, and which must be ruled by political constellations, and perhaps in certain circumstances by sentiment. It was thought, however, to be convenient for those States, which desire to take their part regularly in international intercourse, that they should submit themselves to certain formal limitations of that extreme prerogative. These limitations were intended to protect them against the influence of undesirable elements in the exercise of their rights, and to ensure the State itself, on the one hand, against momentary rashness, and to give the individual, on the other hand, protection against the same danger. This formal safeguard is to consist, according to the view of the Institute, in withdrawing the highly oppressive, and in many respects fatal, measure from the sphere of administration as far as possible, and in referring it to the more deliberate course of special legislation, which in itself affords better guarantees. If, however, owing to the frame of the constitution of any particular country, this course should be found to be impracticable, because e.g. there is no sharp line drawn between statute law and resolutions of the Government, as in States which are under an absolute system, then at least the ordinance should be published for a reasonable time before it acquires absolute force, so as to allow the individuals concerned time to set their affairs in order, so far as may be, without serious loss. Again, it shall not, it is proposed, be lawful to evade the necessity of such special legislation, or of such a general antecedent proclamation, which shall make the public aware of the measure, and inform public opinion and other critics, by issuing orders of expulsion against a multitude of individuals. For the same reason, in dealing with the third kind of expulsion which we have to enumerate (expulsion ordinaire), we require some such preliminary steps, and hold that without them it is unlawful to expel any individual.

C. The expulsion of individuals (expulsion ordinaire) should only take place by reason of special causes to be found in the individual character or circumstances of each person (want of means, commission of a crime, imperilment of the public safety, etc.), and these causes must be made known to the persons concerned. The Institute reserved the subject of this expulsion ordinaire for further deliberation, and merely adopted the resolution that foreigners, who are domiciled in the country, or have a place of business there, should be less exposed to such measures than those who have neither domicile nor place of business; the former class would of course be more severely injured. But even persons who are temporarily resident in the country, or even those who are simply travelling through it, should not be without some safeguard against sentimental measures of expulsion. The declaration which was adopted runs thus:—

“Considérant qu'il peut être utile de formuler d'une manière générale quelques principes constants qui, tout en laissant aux gouvernements les moyens de remplir leur tâche difficile, garantissent à la fois, dans la mesure du possible, la sécurité des Etats, le droit et la liberté des individus :

EXTRAORDINARY EXPULSIONS en masse.

§ 102. It is, lastly, possible that a State, and particularly one of the smaller States, should feel itself in a special degree imperilled by a continuous incursion of foreigners, and should, perhaps, look upon a measure of expulsion as a matter of necessity. No State, it is true, can in the abstract be denied this extraordinary privilege, which will press hardly upon an indefinite crowd of individuals. But, if we consider this privilege rationally, we shall find that it is not an affair that belongs to the regular administrative powers,⁵⁴ but, in so far as it may be possible to draw a line between the legislative and the executive powers, it belongs to the sphere of the former. By such a measure, the social and economical conditions of whole provinces may be most vitally affected. But, at the same time, there is in such cases a moral duty incumbent on the legislature to make the measure generally known, and in such good time that the persons affected by it may be able to set their affairs in order. Periods of weeks or of a few months are not sufficient for the purpose. The question whether there was in this or in that modern instance good ground for such measures, is a question of fact in the region of politics, and is ⁵⁴ The expulsion of foreigners of Polish descent, in 1885, was so treated by the Prussian Government. According to the way in which the law was expressed, the Government was right. It is quite another question whether the use to which the power given to the Government by the Prussian statute was put, in the case in question, was not at variance with the traditions of public law.

therefore beyond the limits of our subject. We need only, however, picture to ourselves what mischievous relations may arise between the different States concerned, what enmities and evils on both sides may grow up out of such measures, in order to admit that the question must necessarily be considered as one which deals with the application of what is a real and a very pressing danger.

The residence of foreigners in the territory of a State can never grow into an unassailable right. But just as little is it possible that the expulsion or extrusion of them should be an arbitrary or a secret proceeding, unless a State is willing to consent to be excluded from the blessings of an orderly and secure commerce with the rest of the world. It must, in such a subject, be the task of international law to set the proper bounds to the power on both sides, and to reconcile with each other as far as possible the legal security of the individual and the safety of the State.⁵⁵

Up to the present time there exists a very vital difference between England and the United States, on the one side, and the States of the Continent of Europe on the other, a difference which may possibly have its origin just as much in the diversity of their geographical positions as in the diversity of their respective views of the proper limits of police interference and of individual freedom of intercourse. The law of England as a matter of fact knows nothing of measures of expulsion except in times of war, and then only with the concurrence of the legislative authority,⁵⁶ and in the United States there is only an exclusion of persons arriving for the first time. On the other hand, in the great States of the Continent of Europe, the expulsion of foreigners is merely a matter for the exercise of the discretion of the administration, i.e. of a single minister,⁵⁷ and the Prussian legislature has lately gone so far as to take occasion expressly to refuse, in the case of the expulsion of persons who do not belong to ⁵⁵ It may be the case that some treaty expressly assures to the citizens of other States the privilege of residence in the territory, and this may be asserted to be the case, if the exercise of trade and commerce is assured, since any such privilege would be illusory unless accompanied by a right of residence. In such cases, we do not hold that the right of expulsion is absolutely renounced, but it must then be confined to individual cases, and the reasons for it must always be communicated to the Government of the person expelled as well as to himself. It would in such a case be a violation of the treaty if an expulsion en masse, or without special reasons founded on the general usages of public law, took place. And in our view, again, if a treaty has been concluded with a Government, which according to its well-known principles makes no distinction between the adherents of different religious denominations, that treaty is violated if the other contracting State subsequently refuses to allow the subjects of the first State to reside, if they belong to some particular confession, e.g. are Jews. On the differences between the Governments of Russia and the United States as to the treatment of the Jews in Russia, see Wharton, Dig. i. § 55.

⁵⁶ See Phillimore, i. § 220. The law of the United States against the immigration of Chinese is a measure of exclusion, not one of expulsion.

⁵⁷ This is the case in France and in Prussia. The Prussian statute as to the general administration of the country, of 30th June 1883, in its 130th section ad fin. expressly denies all appeal to the administrative courts to the foreigner (i.e. person who does not belong to the empire) who has been expelled. See, too, the older law of 26th July 1880. There is no the empire, that legal protection which it affords against many other proceedings of the Executive, by concession of a right to demand a decision from the administrative courts. It may be that in the future there will be a greater agreement in the law, or in the practice of it, upon this point. It may be that, as intercourse increases, and in view of the fashion in which not unfrequently nowadays the masses of the people are incited to violence by foreign agitators, the necessity of expelling individual foreigners who are a source of danger may make itself felt even in England and the United States, while some other States will learn not to confuse really dangerous characters with persons who are politically distasteful to them, or who are suspected of being likely to be inconvenient or actively opposed to the ruling policy of the day.⁵⁸

RETALIATION.

§ 103. Let us, in conclusion, once again touch upon the subject of retaliation. Retaliation and reciprocity are in truth one and the same principle: the presumptions under which the one and the other respectively are worked, are, however, different. The State that starts upon the principle of reciprocity will not treat a foreigner on the same footing as one of its own subjects, unless it shall be positively proved, or at least shown not to be improbable, that the like treatment will be extended in that foreign State to its own subjects.

On the other hand, the State that desires to practise retaliation resolves upon an unequal treatment of foreigners only when it shall be positively assured that an unequal treatment is practised elsewhere upon its own subjects. Retaliation, therefore, is much more conducive to general intercourse than reciprocity. Again, in a question of retaliation the point is whether the foreign State set the citizens of our State, or foreigners in general, at a disadvantage to its own citizens in the matter in question, because they are citizens of our State, or foreigners generally. If it is merely a difference in the foreign law that gives rise to an accidental prejudice to the citizens of our country, and if in like case a subject of the foreign State itself would be treated in the same way, then there is no corresponding law for the German Empire: thus the law of each State must still decide. But, on the ground of § 39, subsec. 2 of the German Criminal Code, a decree of expulsion pronounced by the officials of any one State operates all over the empire. But by art. 4, subsec. 1 of the Constitution of the empire, the empire has the power of passing a statute of expulsion from the whole of the empire. In Prussia, it would appear that the officials do not even think themselves under any obligation to communicate to the person expelled the reasons for his expulsion.

⁵⁸ The editors of the Journal of Private International Law have done good service in exerting themselves to produce a series of expositions of the legal capacity of foreigners, and their general treatment by the laws of different countries, from authors who knew the subject. On Peru, Pradier Fodéré, v. p. 577; on Italy, Esperson, vi. p. 329; on Sweden, Dareste, vii. p. 434; on Austria, Stoerk, vii. p. 329; on Servia, Paulovitch, xi. p. 5. On Germany, see Stobbe i. § 43.

ground for retaliation. Retaliation is only permitted in the view of avoiding injustice to the citizens of our country, and hindering it for time to come. Its object is not, as would be the result in the case we have put, to force the foreign State to apply our laws within its own territory.⁵⁹ In defining retaliation as the establishment of a rule of law that sets foreigners at a disadvantage, it is implied that the rule of law so set up shall not be applicable to rights which have been already acquired,⁶⁰ and that a legislative resolution by the authority of the State shall be necessary for the application of retaliation: the individual judge or a private person has no right to apply it.

APPENDIX.

THE LEGAL CAPACITY OF JURISTIC PERSONS.

THE PRINCIPLE.

§ 104. There may seem to be more difficulty about the recognition of the legal capacity of juristic persons¹ (foundations and incorporations) that belong to another country, than there is about the recognition of the legal capacity of foreigners. To a superficial observation, the former look like purely artificial creations of the law or of statute. Accordingly, the life of these artificial creations must cease at the point at which the power of the legislator ceases, i.e. at the frontier of his dominions; and the foreign legislator will require to reanimate this artificial creation by some special provisions for his own dominions. This is the opinion which Laurent² holds: he is filled with an extreme dislike of religious corporations, and undertakes to show that most other corporations are in the same way mischievous to the public security. The only corporations which he is ready at once to recognise as necessary and beneficial are the State itself, and such corporations as more or less serve objects

⁵⁹ Heffter-Geffeken, § 110; Unger, Oesterr. Privatr. i. pp. 304, 305.

of State, as provinces and communes. But so soon as civilisation has reached a certain pitch, juristic persons press forward on every side, compelling recognition even without special legislation;³ and to such an extent does the practical necessity for them go, that they are in fact recognised, even where legislation does its best to discourage them. As a consequence, they are further removed in such cases from the operation and oversight of the law than if their existence were legally recognised. It is a necessity of human nature, which will take no denial, to combine its resources, and particularly the resources of its wealth, to attain larger and more comprehensive ends: these ends it desires to ensure for a period of future time, by the device of allowing those persons who have the control of the wealth devoted to the attainment of these ends to have no power of action recognised by law, except within the limits necessary for attaining those ends; while, on the other hand, new persons are constantly summoned to the management of the common stock within the same limits, in room of those who retire or die. Therefore, although it would be a serious matter if these so-called juristic persons were to get the upper hand, and positive legislation has often had occasion to interfere with them, still these organisations of legal activity are not to be regarded by any means as artificial, but rather as natural products of an advanced stage of activity in law and in civilisation; if States and nations are to walk in legal community with each other, they will de facto be forced to a mutual recognition of the juristic persons that are constituted or that have grown up in the territory of their neighbours, as possible objects of legal consideration.

The practice of international law gives its sanction to this necessary recognition. It may be that it is only an international usage which exists on this point,⁴ although there is a sufficient chain of legal logic to prove the existence of a rule of law. Laurent denies this, and is of opinion that there is no proof of the assertion to this effect which I made in my former edition.

But let us remember that the legal capacity of juristic persons in their own country is by no mean absolutely the same as that of individuals. A juristic person, which has the power of taking by purchase or other onerous contract, does not necessarily possess a right of succession or a capacity of taking by way of gift, while it may well be denied all rights of acquiring real property, either absolutely or for a long period. The recognition of the legal capacity of foreign juridical persons in a general way does not by any means determine what the extent of this capacity is to be. It does not by any means establish, looking to the very various limitations by which the capacity of juristic persons may be hedged, that juristic persons of another country should be placed on an equality with similar juristic persons belonging to this country, as regards the range of their legal capacity. For it may be imagined that the legislator will desire to treat them differently from those of his own country, over which he can exercise a thorough supervision, and the prosperity of which tends indirectly to the benefit of the country and its subjects.^{5 6}

⁴ Cf. in this sense Asser-Rivier, No. 100, p. 198: "Ainsi la société civile qui a la personnalité civile d'après la loi de son siège social, conservera ce caractère en tout autre pays; ceci découle d'un véritable droit coutumier concernant des personnes civiles que est admis dans une grande partie de l'Europe et que l'on ferait peut être bien de transformer en droit écrit." In the limited sense in which a law of custom is asserted in the text, it exists in England and the United States. Brocher, too, Nouv. Tr. p. 101, says rightly that in the interest of general commerce a company properly formed, according to the law of its situs, should be recognised in a foreign country so far as possible (?).

With regard to the capacity of juridical persons to enjoy legal rights, we may refer to the paper recently published by Danieli in. J. xv. p. 17 and p. 330, "De la condition des sociétés étrangères en Italie." The result of it is—in agreement with the principles which we have already laid down—that foreign companies, and in particular companies constituted by shares, have an absolute right to make contracts in Italy, and to follow out their rights before Italian courts, and that they are only subject to the special provisions of the Italian code in so far as they have branch establishments in Italy. In this latter case, certain provisions of the Italian Commercial Code (art. 230 and art. 90), which ensure the publicity of the memorandum of association and rules of the company, must be observed on the personal responsibility of the managers of the branches. Besides this, all companies which have their seat in Italy and the bulk of their business there, although they may have been formed abroad, are subject to the provisions of the law of Italy, even as regards their memorandum of association. This last provision in Danieli's opinion goes too far, and may give rise to practical difficulties. Perhaps it would be more appropriate to have some penal provision to meet the case of the company being formed abroad in fraudem legis.

CAPACITY TO SUE AND TO BE SUED.

§ 105. It is, however, indispensable that juristic persons existing in a foreign country should be allowed the right of appearing in court, either in the character of pursuers or in that of defenders.⁷ If this is not conceded, the great majority of such persons that exist in different countries would find that commerce with other countries was a perilous undertaking. By such a denial of capacity to sue and be sued, we do not merely refuse juristic persons, whose origin is in another country, all capacity to buy, sell, and acquire property here, but we refuse them the power of acquiring rights in their own country, in so far as such a power has in fact to be carried into effect through the intervention of our courts. For if we refuse them judicial protection—unless that be from caprice or for the sake of penalty, and of course we have no intention here of touching upon any question of penalties—the only ground upon which we can do so is that we shall refuse to recognise the right on which their judicial claim is founded. What would be the results of such a course? Simply that all and every form of intercourse with juristic persons belonging to foreign countries will be cut off, or the most exorbitant measures of precaution, arrestments, and rules as to caution, will be introduced in other countries to the prejudice of our citizens, not to mention the many possible forms of retaliation.⁸

⁵ Gierke, ut sup. cit. p. 153, note 2, properly points out that the treatment of foreign juristic persons stands in many respects under different rules from the treatment of individual foreigners: "Thus the German juristic person has no right, guaranteed by imperial statute, to be allowed to enter every German State."

Thus Foote⁹ notices that it can be shown that in England foreign corporations have been allowed to appear as parties, and particularly as pursuers, since the middle of the eighteenth century, in so far as they could show credentials of incorporation according to the law of their own country; and Wharton (§§ 105 et seq.) testifies more in detail to the practice of the United States, by which foreign corporations, by means of intermediaries, may carry on business in the different States, and, indeed, may on the same conditions as native corporations of the same kind acquire by testament, and even become owners of real property. Lyon-Caen, in a paper in the Journal (xii. p. 271), which is no doubt concerned merely with commercial and manufacturing companies, enunciates the rule that the right of appearing as parties before the courts of France should be conceded to foreign companies universally,¹⁰ without the necessity of any authorisation either legislative or in concreto, at least in suits connected with transactions which have been concluded in another country. Even a positive prohibition against carrying on business in our own country, could have no effect upon the competency of carrying before our courts transactions which were concluded abroad, and which were intended to ⁸ We must therefore protest most strongly against the French rule of practice (see Lyon-Caen and L. Renault, Dr. c. ii. No. 545), by which non-authorised companies cannot de jure either sue or be sued in France. If, then, on grounds of expediency it is recognised, but entirely in odium of these associations, that they may be sued in France, such a onesided system of jurisprudence must, as in the case of the application of the 14th article of her Code Civil by Italy, result in this, that no judgment pronounced in France against such a non-authorised company can receive any recognition in another country.

⁹ Jour. ix. p. 469. [The case referred to by Mr Foote is the Dutch West India Co. v. Moses, 1734, 1, Str. 612.]

¹⁰ On the other hand, Gerbaut, No. 13, takes up throughout the point of view of an anxious system of police. Because these foreign companies may possibly not offer the same guarantees as those which are subject to the law of France, they are not to be allowed to sue in France. I cannot see what the competency of suing has to do with guarantees for orderly trading.

take effect abroad, if they were on some other grounds within the jurisdiction of our courts; and in the same way a suit might competently arise out of transactions which were concluded in our own country, but, as it happened, before the date of the prohibition.¹¹

The Belgian Court of Cassation, in the year 1849, allowed itself to be once misled by Laurent's theory into declaring that foreign joint-stock companies have no right to sue or be sued in Belgium.¹² The legislature, however, subsequently found itself compelled to take the inexorable realities of the necessities of human life¹³ under its protection, as against an abstract and perverted logic, and a Belgian statute of 1855¹⁴ soon gave all commercial and manufacturing French companies legal capacity, and in particular the right of suing and being sued. A treaty with England, of 13th November 1862, has done the same for similar British companies. A Belgian statute of 18th May 1873, in its 128th article, categorically lays down, in direct contradiction to Laurent's theory, "Les sociétés anonymes et les autres associations commerciales, industrielles ou financières constituées et ayant leur siège en pays étranger, pourront faire leurs opérations et ester en justice en Belgique."

Westlake, § 305,¹⁵ says, with reference to English procedure, "there is no technical objection to suit in England by a foreign corporation or other artifi-

The judgment of the Imperial Court points out most sharply on what erroneous assumptions and deductions these startling judgments of the courts below are based. On this matter, see a memorial by Schneegans, Kauffmann and Leiber, published at Strasburg 1881.

¹² See, on this point, Laurent, iv. § 155.

¹³ Laurent, iv. § 155 ad fin. regards, in what we must describe as a most peculiar fashion, this intervention of the legislature as a recognition of the value of the legal doctrine which the statute was passed to remove. Legislatures have, however, often had to intervene against perverse judgments of supreme courts. Haus (par. 118) is also of opinion that this judgment, which asserts territorial sovereignty in a most perverse way, e.g. "attendu que la puissance publique de Belgique est seule capable d'apprécier, au point de vue de l'ordre public et des intérêts belges, si une société anonyme est utile ou dangereuse," contains the only true principle. See, on an analogous dispute dealt with in Italy, and a judgment, corresponding to that Belgian judgment just quoted, pronounced by the Court of Cassation at Turin on 7th March 1884, Gianzana, i. par. 63; and the Consultation pour la société Lyonnaise contre Ballero, edited by Danieli and revised by Clunet, Lyon-Caens, etc., Paris 1886. Gianzana and the other authors of the opinion all pronounce the views of the court at Turin to be wrong. Now the principles for the decision of such questions are those of the Italian Code of Commerce of 1882. See below, § 106.

¹⁵ See to this effect also Foote, p. 71.

cial person. It may sue, subject to the question whether the local law of the transaction authorised it to act in its corporate or other artificial character."

The authority of the English judge, Mr Justice Lindley, is to the same effect,¹⁶ and Buchere's¹⁷ authority shows that up to the passing of the French statute of 30th May 1857,¹⁸ which was passed to meet the judgment of the Belgian Court of Cassation, French jurisprudence universally conceded to foreign companies a persona standi in judicio. An Austrian ordinance of 29th November 1865 is to this effect: "Every foreign joint-stock company and investment company with shares, excepting insurance companies, is recognised in Austria¹⁹ as legally constituted, and is allowed to conduct its commercial business under its firm name like similar companies belonging to this country, if," etc., etc.²⁰ This objection might no doubt be taken, that, whereas the law of this country requires, for the existence of juristic persons, the fulfilment of certain conditions—e.g. requires the special sanction of the Government—the same guarantee is not to be found in the case of foreign companies,²¹ and we thus run a risk, in recognising the legal capacity of foreign companies and corporations, of recognising some which may, by irregular methods of trading, do our State economical injury,²² and of giving foreign companies not ¹⁶ Lindley on Company Law, pp. 909 et seq.

¹⁷ Buchere, Des actions judiciaires exercées en France par les sociétés anonymes étrangères, in the Jour. ix. p. 37.

¹⁸ The words of this statute are: Art. i. "Les sociétés anonymes et les autres associations commerciales, industrielles ou financières qui sont soumis à l'autorisation du gouvernement Belge et qui l'ont obtenue, peuvent exercer tous leurs droits et ester en justice en France en se conformant aux lois de l'Empire."

Art. ii. "Un décret impérial rendu en conseil d'Etat peut appliquer à tout autre pays le bénéfice de l'article I."

As Buchere shows, this statute, an indirect result of Laurent's mistaken theory, produced a host of doubts and difficulties. (See, too, Gerbaut, § 162, who, however, defends its principle.) The decrees sanctioned by the second article have been promulgated in favour of many States. But still some States are left out, and companies belonging to them cannot be brought before the French courts. That would plainly, however, be to the prejudice of French creditors. The somewhat bold device, therefore, is adopted that the company, as being in fact a company (association de fait), may be sued, but cannot sue. Besides this, doubts have arisen from the circumstance that in France, and in a great number of other countries, no more special licenses are given for the establishment of joint-stock companies. This statute shows how a simple matter may be thrown into confusion by misapplied caution, and shows, also, that statutes are not always better than the rule given by practice.

²² To this effect the ratio of the judgment of the Belgian Court of Cassation already mentioned, which is quoted and approved by Laurent.

unfrequently privileges²³ over those of our own country, which have to satisfy more stringent conditions when they are set on foot. This argument, however, proves nothing against the admission of foreign companies as parties to suits: in this case we have nothing to do with privileges of trade, but merely with the protection of rights already acquired and vested. Besides, it may very well be matter of dispute, which set of conditions is the more severe; and what are we to say if we shall find two States establishing contradictory conditions?^{24 25} Is a company, if by chance an opportunity presents itself of starting a business in some other country, with profit to that country, to be put to the trouble of fulfilling all the conditions which the law of that country requires of its own companies? If there is any apprehension as to reckless trading by foreign companies, it would in any event be more practical to give Government the power to forbid, in exceptional cases, the companies of a particular State to carry on trade, or to forbid particular companies to do so, rather than to adopt by legislation, or to read into the law, any such general preventive measures, the operation of which would be indefinite in extent.

CAPACITY TO CONTRACT.

§ 106. We must at once concede to every foreign juristic person and company the right of doing business by means of letters and telegrams, or by agents, with the citizens of this country,²⁶ under reservation of the right

²³ See judgment of the Court of Cassation at Turin, of 7th March 1884 (Jour. xii. 471), although this has in view not the capacity of suing, but the privilege of trading in Italy. But, on the other hand, see Clunet's note to it. The judgment of the Appeal Court at Genoa had been to a different effect (Jour. xi. p. 555).

²⁴ See, in this sense, Weiss, p. 877.

²⁵ As to the law which has been recognised in Germany since the statute of 18th July 1884, see Wolff (De la condition des sociétés étrangères en Allemagne, Jour. xiii. p. 134). According to it, such differences are of no importance as regards trading, and the establishment of branches in the German Empire. This must certainly be the true practical principle. Certain notices, however, are absolutely required to be given to the tribunal of commerce according to German law, when a branch is established in Germany. The proper penalty to be imposed upon the agents of the company in Germany, for neglect of that provision, will be determined by German law, without prejudice to the question whether another country would accord execution to the judgment imposing the penalty, or would not.

²⁶ Foote (Jour. ix. pp. 485, 486) assures us that it is assumed in the United States that a foreign company may contract in any of the States of the Union. The provisions of the Spanish Commercial Code of 1885-1886, art. 15, are to the same effect. In Canada, as a decision of the Privy Council on 29th July 1873 determines [Chaudière Gold Mining Co. v. Desbarats, etc., L.R. 5 P.C. 277], foreign trading companies enjoy the same rights as native companies. In Denmark, apart from Iceland, foreign trading companies have a direct right to sue, in which case their legality, i.e. their conformity to the law of their native State, is taken for granted, and they have also right to do business by agents, without the necessity of a license. They cannot, it is true, do business in Denmark directly, i.e. without appointing agents (statute of 29th December 1857). See Hindenburg (Jour. xi. p. 35). The draft of the new Portuguese Commercial Code of 1887, the work of Beirão, the minister of justice, in its 119th article concedes universally to trading companies, constituted according to foreign law, the capacity of contracting in Portugal.

of the State to make special prohibitions against the transaction of business of any particular kind (which may possibly cover the whole sphere of the operation of the company's undertaking), or, to put it more precisely, the right of forbidding the subjects of our State to enter into any such contracts, and of denying such contracts all effect in our country, and before our courts. This rule is favoured by the most distinct train of practice. We see every day that governments conclude financial contracts with foreign companies. How can we reconcile this fact with a denial of legal capacity to these companies?

It is plain that, if such companies set up permanent agencies and branches in this country, distinct regulations can be imposed upon them, and the new Italian Code of Commerce, in its 230th and 231st articles, contains very practical provisions for such cases. They rest upon the principle²⁷ that the rules, as to the publication of the articles of the company and of its prospectus, which obtain for native companies, must be observed by foreign companies also, whereas there is, very properly, no mention of making the articles of association fit the law of Italy.²⁸ If these publications, which are thought to be necessary for the protection of the public, are neglected, the correct result, which is to be inferred from the 231st article of the Italian Code of Commerce, is that the administrators and agents of the company, who have carried on its business in Italy, are declared to be personally responsible.²⁹ If, in addition, we do nothing to prevent the foreign companies being responsible to the full extent of the property belonging to them in this country, far better provision is made for the interests of the public, the creditors in this country, and generally a far better guarantee is taken for the observance of our law, than would be accomplished by forbidding foreign companies to enjoy any legal capacity at all in this country. If we were to proceed on this latter footing, we should not be able logically to make any claim against the property of these companies in this country, for in law they would not have any property. This difficulty is recognised by Laurent (iv. § 160), and has as matter of fact been dealt with by the French courts. Laurent remarks that the Appeal Court in Paris did, as a question of logic, come to a sound conclusion, in denying, in a judgment of 15th April 1863, the possibility of suing a foreign company in France.³⁰

²⁹ The Portuguese draft code (§§ 120, 121) is to the same effect.

But we shall have to recognise the legal capacity of foreign juristic persons—in so far as that consists in the capacity to sue and be sued, and in the legality of their doing business by means of letters, telegrams and agents—even if juristic persons and corporations of the same kind could have no legal existence with us. Why, for instance, shall a foreign monastery not sue in this country for the performance of the prestations of a lease of a piece of land situated in another country, or why should a religious brotherhood which makes liqueurs or laces, not be able to sell these wares in our country, and raise up corresponding claims for payment which our courts must recognise? In so far as the particular transaction in question has no object in view which our law disapproves,³¹ the general object of the foreign association cannot be matter for the consideration of our courts. The true meaning of the opposite opinion would simply be that we should sit in judgment upon the domestic arrangements of the foreign State: many things may find acceptance with it, which we reject. We might with as much justice bid our judges take into account, in an ordinary petitory action, the question whether the creditor was likely to use the sum for which he sues in a way that could be justified by moral rules. A proposal that from the point of view of international law we should in such matters draw distinctions, and treat ecclesiastical or charitable foundations differently from commercial associations, foreign States, cities, and communes, can hardly be called anything else than fanciful. It is, besides, not at all practical, for, on the one hand, entire States with their Governments may fall absolutely under the guidance and dominion of clerical authority, and, on the other hand, the foreign corporation may

³¹ If in our State, for instance, it were illegal, at least for our citizens, to send children to educational or boarding establishments which are managed by particular religious corporations, it might no doubt be that an action by a foreign corporation of the kind against a citizen of this country, for a sum due for board for his children who had been sent there, might possibly have to be thrown out. The question would be whether the law had simply imposed a penalty as for a crime, or had pronounced that such contracts were as a matter of civil law invalid. [The Italian courts have, however, held that a "moral person" of foreign nationality, the Congregation des dames du sacre Coeur, cannot be recognised or allowed to plead in the courts of Italy. No sovereign can give any such body a legal existence beyond his own territory, and as their objects must be political, economical, moral or religious, they must always have a strong national character, and therefore have no claim to recognition out of their own land. C. de Cass. Rome, 1889. J. xvii. p. 739.]

attain its end by putting forward some confidential person, to whom it assigns its rights.³²

LIMITATIONS.

§ 107. As we have seen, it is impossible to avoid attributing to foreign juristic persons capacity to sue and to be sued, and recognising contracts³³ which they have concluded in their own country by letters or by means of agents, and which are intended to operate there: again, apart from special prohibitions, it is a general rule that they should be held capable of contracting in our country also. But all this does not imply that we must recognise the legal capacity of foreign juristic persons in all possible relations, e.g. attribute to them the capacity of holding real property or taking by succession.³⁴ In these cases, although legal presumptions may tend to assert equality in the eye of the law for all juristic persons,³⁵ which serve an object recognised by all mankind, or even a religious object, if it is one that is recognised in our country also, still the State has a free hand to exclude foreign companies, it may be on the ground that it cannot exercise the same superintendence over them as over native companies. International intercourse does not in general suffer any intolerable disturbance by the imposition of such restrictions upon foreign juristic persons. In particular, it seems desirable that foreign companies should not de plano have right to the permanent ownership of real property, and that general rules should be laid down for the establishment of branches and agencies. In this way sufficient precautions will be taken against the risks that might spring from a general recognition of the legal capacity of foreign juristic persons.³⁶

³³ The rules as to the formation of a company required by the country in which the company does business, but has not its seat, cannot be applied to companies formed abroad. Judgment of the court of Lyons, 7th Jan. 1881 (Jour. viii. 159).

³⁴ Gianzana, i. § 73, and the ratio of a judgment of the Court of Cassation at Turin, of 18th Nov. 1882 cited by him (affirming the Court of Appeal at Genoa), lay down that foreign juristic persons must be held to have the capacity of taking by succession if native juristic persons of the same kind have that capacity, and that in particular the capacity of a foreign State which has been instituted as heir must be recognised.

In Prussia, at least within its territory governed by the Preussisches Allgemeines Landrecht, foreign and native corporations have the like capacity of taking legacies. But see note 38 infra as to a limitation in this respect, and generally Förster, Theorie und Praxis des heutigen Preuss. Privatrechts, iv. § 251, note 46.

³⁶ See the excellent grounds of judgment on this point given by the Court of Cassation in Turin, cited supra, note 34.

But, on the other hand, foreign establishments and associations cannot make good in our country privileges which are only accorded to them within their own: ³⁷ rights, too, which even our own juristic persons must acquire in some particular way, are not conceded to the foreign juristic person except by special license of the government of this country. ³⁸ Any other view would set our own establishments at a disadvantage with those of other countries. The concession of equal legal rights to foreign establishments and associations is of course also excluded if the rights in question, either by the special enactment of our own legislation or by implication from its provisions, are to be confined to juristic persons of this country. This latter is the case, for example, with the special privileges given to the Fisk. ³⁹ It is impossible to suppose that our own subjects should have been intended to be put at a disadvantage with the Fisk of another country.

An association, again, which has no validity in its own country, can never claim the rights of a juristic person in any other country. The only objects which a juristic person has in matters of private law, are, first, to make it possible to give certain individuals shares in an estate as a perpetuity on certain conditions previously arranged, or, secondly, to ensure to an indefinite number of persons the enjoyment and advantages to be

Among limitations of this kind we must also reckon the requirement of a special State license, such as, for example, is laid down in the second section of the Prussian statute of 23rd February 1870, viz.: "Gifts and legacies to native or foreign corporations, or other juristic persons, require for their validity the approval to their full amount of the king or of the official nominated by a royal decree, if their value exceeds the sum of 1000 thalers."

In such a case, if the legacy is in favour of a foreign corporation or foundation, a double license may possibly be required, one from the State in which the corporation or foundation has its seat, and one from the State to which the donor or the legatee belonged: see § 3 of the Prussian statute which we have cited: "A fine not exceeding 300 thalers may be imposed on . . . 2nd, any person who makes over to a foreign corporation or other juristic person a gift or a legacy before the proper license for this purpose has been obtained." The necessary license may possibly be refused on account of the excessive accumulation of property in manu mortua or the extravagant endowment of a foundation, and also for behoof of the natural heirs of the testator or donor, e.g. if they appear to be in want. In the former point of view, what has to be considered is the interest of the State in which the corporation has its seat, in the latter the interest of the State to which the donor or testator belongs. Such a license is necessary even for a foreign State, if acquisition by succession, or the ownership of landed property by juristic persons, is associated with such a license. It is no offence against the sovereign powers of the foreign State that such a license should be required. Cf. Giansana, i. par. 77, and the decision of the Appeal Court at Genoa of 6th Aug. 1881, which he quotes.

³⁹ Wächter, ii. p. 181, Unger, ut cit.: he would, however, allow the churches of other countries the same privileges as ours.

derived from some particular thing or undertaking. As regards those of the former class, the division of the estate in the eye of the law takes place where the company has its seat; if, then, by the law which rules there, it turns out to be invalid, the object of the association cannot as a matter of law be attained. In the latter class of cases, it is just as plain that the object of the association can as a matter of fact never be attained if the State, in which the undertaking or establishment is to be set up, does not sanction it. A foreign State that treated as a juristic person an association that was not recognised in its own country, would be treating as valid businesses which were directed to objects that were impossible either legally or physically, a result which would be inconsistent with general principles of logic.^{40 41}

COMPANIES WHOSE OPERATION IS SUBSTANTIALLY CONFINED TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES. In fraudem legis?

§ 108. One effect of the recognition of the legal capacity of foreign juristic persons may no doubt be, that the true business activity of a company shall for the most part belong to the territory of another State⁴² than that in which as a matter of form it has its seat. It is possible that in this way legislative provisions for the restraint of companies may be evaded. For instance, it may be that the business of a mining company is truly carried on in State A, while the company itself is formed in State B, because it desires to be free from the conditions which State A has imposed upon the formation of such companies.

Westlake (§ 306) raises this difficulty, but does not supply any solution of it. One must overlook it, unless one desires to interfere prejudicially with the beneficial expenditure of capital in other countries. A company may have very good reasons for being willing that the conduct of its business should be subject to the laws and the courts of another country, and, it may be, to the large discretionary powers of a foreign government, while it is not willing that the rights of its shareholders inter se and its whole capital should be. The weight of these reasons is, of course, specially felt where the business is carried on in countries which are uncivilised or

⁴⁰ Cf. Mohl, Staatsrecht, Völkerrecht und Politik, i. p. 621: "It is easy to prove that the position of the members of a company is in public law conditioned by the legislation of its own country, and the treatment there accorded to it. An association, which has no legal existence in its own country, has no existence for any foreign State. . . . Its circumstances in a foreign country cannot place it in any different rank from that which it really holds in its own country."

⁴¹ It follows from what has been said that the question, whether a foreign juristic person has ceased to exist, must be determined by the foreign law which prevails at the place where it has its seat (e.g. whether as a consequence of bankruptcy it is dissolved), R.G.I. 18th Feb. 1885 (Bolze, Praxis, par. 42, p. 10).

⁴² But the company cannot do any of the things that are proper to the seat of the company, outwith the State in which it is formed. A general meeting held in another country has been held null by the courts of the United States (Foote, Jour. ix. 485, 486).

only partly civilised. But it is impossible here to draw the line between two classes of cases, and the dangers are not so serious, when we remember that the trade or business itself is subject to the laws of the place in which it is carried on,⁴³ and that the publications required by that law must take place. Public traffic in the shares and obligations of foreign companies, the basis of which is unsatisfactory, may be prohibited.⁴⁴ Upon the whole, however, the necessary regulations for this purpose may be left to the exchanges and chambers of commerce. It would be contradictory of our theory, if we were only to allow the scrip and shares of those foreign companies, which had been formed in accordance with the requirements of our own law, to obtain a quotation on our exchanges. On the other hand, it is very difficult, unless we are prepared to have recourse to the discretion of the police authorities—a step which is in favour in many States on the Continent of Europe, but commands, perhaps, little sympathy in England and the United States—to prescribe, by legislative enactment,⁴⁵ the special conditions under which foreign companies, in contradistinction to native companies, are to be allowed to carry on their trade in this country.⁴⁶

NOTE C ON §§ 104-8. LAW AS TO FOREIGN CORPORATIONS AND COMPANIES.

["It is an established rule of private international law that a corporation duly created according to the laws of one State may sue and be sued in its corporate name in the courts of other States" (Lindley on Company Law, p. 909; Westlake, § 305). "There is no technical objection to suit in England by a foreign corporation or other artificial person." "We make no inquiry into the constitution of a foreign company any more than we should into the generation of an individual suing here" (per Erle, C. J. in Branley v. S.E. Ry. Co. 12 C.B.N.S. p. 70).

Lindley, however, goes on to say, "as regards procedure and parties to actions, the law of the country in which the action is brought prevails:" and from this he infers that a company which has been empowered by a ⁴³ The company therefore may be answerable to third parties, who have contracted with it at the place in which its business is carried on, in the same way as if it had been formed there. See the judgment of the tribunal of commerce of Antwerp, of 10th July 1877 (Jour. v. p. 526).

foreign or colonial Government to sue through a public officer, cannot do so in England, the privilege given to it being a mere rule of procedure, applicable only in the country of its origin, and having no power to control the procedure that may be laid down by the lex fori.

The courts of England have, in the case of Bullock v. Caird (1875, L.R. 10, Q.B. 276), carried the application of the lex fori in questions affecting partnerships a step further. In that case, an action had been brought in the English courts against one member of a Scottish co-partnery, in respect of an obligation due by the co-partnery. It was pleaded for the defender that, by the law of Scotland, where a co-partnery is held to be in law a separate person, it was a condition precedent to individual liability being established, that the firm as such separate person, or the whole individual partners jointly, should have been sued, so as to constitute the debt in proper form. The court held that this raised a mere question of procedure, and that although the omission might have been a bar to action in the courts of Scotland, the English court, where no such rule of procedure was known, could not be bound to give effect to it. The plea was accordingly repelled.

With deference to the opinion of the English court, this case seems to have been badly decided: the plea raised much more than a mere point of procedure: it involved this, viz. that the proper debtor, i.e. the co-partnery, had not been called. It is thought that the English court, on the principle cited from Erle, C. J. supra, were bound to accept the legal person duly created by the law of Scotland, just as they would have accepted a joint-stock company properly registered, and therefore incorporated, as a separate person from any of the shareholders. In contradiction of this English decision, we find, in the case of Muir v. Collett (1862, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xxiv. 1119), what appears to be the sound principle recognised by the Scottish courts, viz. that the law of the domicile of a partnership (in that case India), must determine the nature of its constitution, so as to settle whether it has a separate person in law, by which it shall sue and be sued.

On the other hand, the jurisdiction of the English courts over companies domiciled abroad depends on whether these companies, through their property or agents, are amenable to the process of the English court. The same rules as are applicable in the case of individuals will be applicable here.

"Places of business," says Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst (Carron Co. v. Maclaren, 1855, 5 Cl. H. of L. 449), "may, for the purposes of jurisdiction, properly be deemed the domicile," and for these purposes his Lordship thinks there may possibly be several domiciles. For the limited purpose of jurisdiction there seems to be no principle against a multiplicity of domiciles. The possession of an agency in Scotland will give the Scottish courts jurisdiction over a foreign company. Mackay, Practice of the Court of Session, vol. i. p. 182.

Again, it has been held that a company, although foreign in the sense that it was constituted abroad under a foreign law, and its shares are held by foreigners, may yet be wound up in England, if its principal place of business be in England (Princess Reuss v. Bos, etc., 1871, L. R. 5, E. and I. App. 176). If, however, it has merely carried on business in England through agents, without having any office there, the court will not push its jurisdiction so far (Lloyd Generale Italiano, 1885, L. R. 29, Ch. Div. 219).

The liabilities of members of joint-stock companies will, in England, be determined by the law of the land under which they were formed. Thus, for instance, if by the law of France the corporation, and not the shareholders who make up that corporation, are liable in damages for delicts, or quasi delicts, committed in the course of carrying on the business of the corporation, the English courts will protect a shareholder against whom, as an individual, proceedings are being taken in England (General Steam Navigation Co. v. Guillou, 1843, 11, M. and W. 877).

It was at one time thought (Westlake, § 306) that a company incorporated in one country could not carry on business in another country, so as to acquire a right to sue on contracts entered into there: it was said that such a company was trading beyond the limits under which it had been constituted, and that a company belonging to a country where the conditions of incorporation were less rigid might have advantages over others constituted in countries where the law requires certain formalities and conditions to be observed, so as to ensure fair trading, or, it may be, for fiscal purposes. The Canadian courts countenanced this view; but the English courts have assumed the contrary. The high authority of Mr Justice Lindley (p. 910) is to this effect: "It is conceived that a foreign corporation can sue in this country on all contracts entered into with it in this country, provided such contracts are warranted by the constitution of the corporation, and are not illegal by English law." This may be taken to be the law of England and of Scotland. In the Circuit Court of the United States, it has been held that a company, validly constituted by the law of one State, may carry on business in another without being required to fulfil the particular conditions which the law of that other State requires of its own companies. (Att. Gen. of N.Y. Albany Law Jour. xxxvii. 371, Jour. xvii. 372.)

If the law were otherwise, every company desiring to trade in a foreign country would require to be incorporated anew, and it might be on a totally new footing. The author points out how inconvenient and cumbrous it would be to require this of a foreign trading company: the recognition of the incorporation of a company which has been validly formed under the provisions of a foreign law is demanded by the first principles of international law, which assume that in all civilised countries safeguards of the same kind, although differing infinitely in detail, will be adopted to ensure honest dealing and the administration of justice; and finally, the language of the conventions concluded between different powers seems at once to coincide with the theories expressed in the text, and to show what the common experience of nations has found necessary and advantageous. If the doubts of the Canadian courts were well founded, the recognition of foreign corporations and their rights would be so limited as to be illusory.

The powers of the corporation, the limits of its legal capacity—e.g. its capacity to hold land—must be determined by reference to a double canon, first, its powers as defined by its constitution, and second, by reference to the law of the country where it proposes to exercise its powers; the law of its domicile will determine whether it has been validly incorporated, and what are the limits of its capacity, but it will not be allowed in another country to trade at the expense and to the disadvantage of corporations belonging to that country, because, in the country of its own domicile, legal persons are free from the restraints which the law of the country in which they propose to trade imposes upon them. The extent of the mutual recognition of foreign companies in modern times is expressed in the conventions concluded between England and France, 15th May 1862; England and Belgium, 8th December 1862; England and Italy, 26th November 1867; and England and Germany, 27th March 1874. The operative clauses in these conventions, which are valid in Ireland and Scotland, as well as in England, are in nearly the same terms. The most recent runs thus: "Joint-stock companies and other associations, commercial, industrial, and financial, constituted and authorised in conformity with the laws in force in either of the two countries, may freely exercise in the dominions of the other all their rights, including that of appearing before tribunals, whether for the purpose of bringing an action or for defending themselves, in conformity, however, with the laws and customs in force in the said countries. . . . Such companies or associations, authorised in either of the two countries, shall only be admitted to the exercise of their business or trade in the dominions of the other country, if found to be in compliance with the conditions prescribed by the laws of that country."

In Germany, following out the same principle as the law of England, that the legal capacity of a legal person is, like that of individuals, to be determined by the law of the domicile, the German courts have recognised and allowed to a foreign company, validly formed according to foreign law, a right of action against German subjects, although the principles of its constitution are forbidden in Germany, and companies so constituted are declared null (Holthausen & Cie v. Comptoir d'escompte de Paris, App. Ct. cf. Cöln. 28th April 1877, Jour. v. 629). The grounds of this decision are precisely the same as those on which Mr Justice Lindley defends his doctrine, as stated above. A foreign company may have to find caution for expenses, unless in exceptional circumstances the court allows it to sue without doing so. In order, however, legally to establish an agency in Germany, a foreign company must obtain leave from the State in which its branch is to be established, and publish in the required form a summary of its memorandum of association, etc. Certain kinds of business, e.g. life insurance, cannot be carried on in Germany by foreign companies, except on the same conditions as those on which German companies are authorised to carry them on. A decision of the Imperial Tribunal of 14th April 1882

(Jour. x. p. 317) has determined that an insurance company, which has been interdicted from carrying on business in one of the States of the empire, may nevertheless sue in the German courts for premiums which fall due subsequently to the date of the interdict, but under a policy which had been taken out before it.

In France the constitution of a foreign company will be recognised just as the majority of an individual would be, and no French shareholder will appeal successfully to the courts of his own country to protect him against resolutions passed by the shareholders of a foreign company, to which he belongs, in conformity with the requirements of the law of the country to which the company belongs (Buisson v. Ch. de Fer Seville-Xeres-Cadiz, Trib. de comm. de la Seine, 25th June 1875, Jour. iii. 363); just as no French creditor can appeal to the courts of his own country to give him redress against a resolution passed in the course of the liquidation of a foreign company abroad by the statutory majority of creditors (Dubois de Luchet v. Cie de Chemin de Fer du Nord de l'Espagne, C. de Cass. Paris, 18th January 1876, Jour. iv. 237). So, too, a foreign company need not conform to the requirements of French law as to the subscription of capital, or as to the payment of any specified proportion of the value of each share (Trib. corr. de la Seine, 20th June 1883, Jour. x. 521). Disputes between Frenchmen, who are shareholders in a foreign company, and that company as to calls upon shares, or as to the legality of forfeiture of shares, must go for their determination to the courts of the country in which the company has its seat (Aragon v. Société de Tharsis, 28th April 1884, Jour. xi. 520, and Banque Européenne v. Rumpier, 28th July 1884, Jour. xi. 403).

A foreign company, however, in order to sue, carry on business or establish branches in France, must be authorised generally to do so by the French Government; i.e. the French Government must have approved the conditions under which, in the country to which the company belongs, such companies are constituted. Unless such a general authority has been given, foreign companies cannot sue in France, even on contracts concluded in their own country.

It may, of course, happen that a company, which has its principal office abroad, may have established it there with the express purpose of engaging in some trade not permitted in the country to which it truly belongs, and of escaping some restrictions upon the constitution of companies which are imposed by the law of the country to which it truly belongs—i.e. where its directors or managers reside, where its trade truly lies, and where its shares are held; such an illusory establishment will certainly not be recognised so as to oust the penal jurisdiction of the country to which the directors belong, or to dispense with the formalities required by its law (Compagnie de Chemin de Fer du Nord et de Catalogne, C. de Paris, 2nd July 1877, Jour. v. 274). But a mere agency or a subsidiary establishment in France, coupled with the fact that the shares are to a large extent held by Frenchmen, will not make a company amenable to French law, so that any neglect in its constitution of the requirements of French law, which in the case of a French company would involve its directors in criminal responsibility, can be charged against them in a French court, if the meetings of shareholders have always been held abroad, the capital largely employed abroad, and the chief office situated abroad, the company having been originated and incorporated abroad (Chandora v. Banque Européenne, 10th February 1881, Trib. corr. de la Seine, Jour. viii. p. 158). Nor will the establishment of an agency in France give a company the same status as an individual acquires by residence, accompanied by Government license to reside—viz. a title to bring actions against a foreigner in a French court (Rubattino v. Kuntz & Werder, 25th Feb. 1878, Trib. comm. de Marseilles, Jour. v. 372). This latter decision is not in conflict with what has been above taken to be the law of England; a company is treated like an individual, and its right to sue is regulated according to its true nationality, and not according to its domicile. It is a principle of French law that the right to sue being a "droit civil," does not belong to foreigners; hence a mere trading domicile does not give a right to sue in France, where the defender is also a foreigner, but a foreign company with a general authorisation, just like a foreign individual, may sue a French debtor in France. Again, just as an individual, residing or trading in France, may be sued there by a French creditor, although he is not by birth or naturalisation a French subject, because it is, according to the French law, the first object of the legislator to protect his own citizens, so a foreign company which has an agent in France may be sued there upon contracts made in France by their agent (Duché et Fils v. Raymond et Cie., C. de Cass. Paris, 10th August 1875, Jour. iii. 459; Crédit Industriel v. Quesnel, &c., 1881, Jour. ix. p. 424). The domicile of the foreigner will be held to be at the place in which his agency exists (Racine v. Banque Ottomane, C. de Cass. 4th March 1885, Jour. xii. 304). In matters of title to sue and defend there is, as French jurisprudence expresses it, no distinction taken between an individual and a moral (i.e. a legal) person.

The regulations as to the quotation of shares on the Bourse, and the sale and purchase of them there, which are applicable to French companies are not applicable to the shares of foreign companies (Roges v. Soc. Générale, 25th May 1883, Jour. xi. p. 192, and other cases there cited).

In Italy, the position of foreign companies is regulated by the provisions of the new Code of Commerce, which came into force on 1st January 1883. Foreign companies are allowed to exercise all the powers which belong to them by their constitution, and to plead in the Italian courts, on condition of publishing the conditions of their association and certain other particulars as to their constitution, and provided that the interests of Italian shareholders are sufficiently protected (Ct. of Milan, 19th September 1882, Jour. xi. 555). Their constitution is governed by the law of their place of origin.

In Austria foreign companies, in order to enjoy a title to sue and defend, and to carry on their business in Austria, must obtain in each case authority from the Government, and must submit to the Government reports of their general meetings, and two balance-sheets, one of their general business and one of the business they have done in Austria. If they desire to open branch establishments in Austria, they must appoint as their agents domiciled Austrians, approved by the Austrian Government.

In Hungary, a foreign company will not be allowed to carry on business by means of a branch establishment without a license from the tribunal having jurisdiction in the place where it is to be established. No such license will be given to a company belonging to a country which does not give like privileges to Hungarian companies; and, after the branch is established, it must submit balance-sheets, etc., as in Austria.

In Belgium and Switzerland, foreign companies need no license to carry on business, or to plead in courts of law. If, however, they desire to establish branches, they must observe the same requirements as to publication of their constitution, etc., as are required of native companies. In Belgium, their articles of association and other credentials must be published in full: an abstract or summary is not accepted.

In Russia, special sanction must be obtained, before any foreign company can plead, unless it is a company belonging to a country with which Russia has concluded treaties on the subject (Imperial Court of Cassation, 1883, Jour. xiv. 171).

In Turkey, by a decree of 25th November 1887 (Jour. xv. 438), foreign companies can only establish agencies and branches under the sanction of an Imperial irade. To obtain this sanction, the articles of the company must be produced, and when the sanction is obtained, the company must choose a legal domicile for itself. Penalties are provided for the event of any company carrying on business without having previously obtained this sanction.]

APPENDIX II.

LIABILITY TO TAXATION IN INTERNATIONAL INTERCOURSE.

NECESSITY OF DEFINITE AND EQUITABLE PRINCIPLES.

§ 109. The proper international limits of the right of taxation must be viewed as an important subject for the consideration of international law, when we consider the constant increase in the demands, which the revenue laws of different States are making upon the property and the income of individuals. But up to the present time we find only a few equitable principles timidly venturing to put themselves forward. It is very often the case that the simple principle of extending the tax to all persons and things, which it seems in any way possible to reach, is allowed to prevail, without any attention being paid to the question whether so wide an extension of the liability to taxation is in accordance either with the principle of the impost itself, or with the circumstance that some other State, on the same ground, makes a like claim upon the same individual. To the complications and the frequent caprices of legislative enactments, we often find added the circumstance that the authorities of the State, in matters of this kind, do their best to limit or obstruct legal processes, and that the reasons for which administrative officers decide in this or that way are only to a small extent or with difficulty accessible to the public.

The case of double taxation, be it avowed, or be it concealed in so far as the same tax goes under different names in different States, will in the present condition of revenue legislation very frequently occur, whatever pains may be taken to avoid a double impost. Such a double taxation does not, it is certain, give the individual any right to protest against one of the two. From a legal point of view, every State may follow out its rights, i.e. its rights within the meaning of its own legislation, so far as the limits of its jurisdiction extend.¹ The only remedy that can be devised is a system of treaties, or the enactment of clauses of reciprocity in our legislation. To a certain extent, we may on equitable grounds allow taxation which has been imposed by another country upon our citizens, and to which on principle we hold that they should not have been subjected, to serve as a ground for exemption in this country.²

A tax may be intended to fall upon a person, a thing,³ or a transaction. It is obvious that, where a tax is intended to fall upon a person, that person must have some permanent relation to the State which is raising the tax. We may in the meantime refrain from determining whether that relation is to be constituted by nationality or domicile, or lastly, merely by residence for a considerable time within the State. Persons who remain only temporarily for quite a short time in the State cannot be touched by such a tax.⁴ If taxes are meant to satisfy the necessities of the State, it cannot be asserted of persons who are only temporarily present in the State, that

⁴ “Taxation may no doubt be imposed, in conformity with the law of nations, by a sovereign on the property within his jurisdiction of a person who is domiciled in and owes allegiance to a foreign country. It is otherwise, however, as to a tax imposed, not on the property, but on the person of the party taxed, when elsewhere domiciled, and elsewhere a citizen. Such a decree is internationally void and . . . gives a right to appeal for diplomatic intervention. Despatch of the Secretary of State for the United States of 1883, Wharton, Dig. ii. § 204, p. 514.

they derive any benefit worth mentioning from its arrangements. In any case, the benefit may be regarded as sufficiently balanced by the indirect duties levied upon necessities, which will affect even persons who spend but a short time in the country. In addition, there are very great practical difficulties in the way of levying any considerable revenue directly from foreigners in such circumstances.

PERSONAL TAXES. (NATIONALITY OR DOMICILE?)

§ 110. Taxes, which fall directly on persons as such, will in the present day be more or less of the nature of income tax, and the first question that must be considered is whether in this matter the domicile or the nationality of the person is to rule. On principles of public law, no objection can be taken to the State taxing its citizens, who are living in a foreign country, at its own discretion. But natives who are domiciled abroad as a matter of fact derive but little benefit, so long as this domicile lasts, from the arrangements of their native country; while, on the other hand, it must seem a peculiar privilege that foreigners who for a considerable time have lived in this country should go free from taxation. It seems desirable, therefore, to take the principle of domicile to regulate income tax.⁵ This is certainly the rule in most systems,⁶ and that it should be so is perhaps to some extent accounted for by the fact that attempts to lay on and to collect income tax in a foreign country would very frequently encounter insurmountable difficulties. It might perhaps be possible for a State, with good practical results, to levy from its citizens in foreign parts a certain tax as an equivalent for the protection which it extends to its subjects abroad, and sometimes at great expense. On the other hand, in order to meet the frequent attempts which are made to evade the law in this respect, a stay of a certain duration in the country, or in some particular place, as the case may be, may be held equivalent to the acquisition of a true domicile.⁷ Of course, there is no justification in principle for the application by the legislature of the principles of domicile

⁵ See, too, Bluntschli, Völkerr. § 376.

⁶ The law, formerly of the North German Federation, now of the German Empire, dated 13th May 1870, in order to put an end to double taxation, adopted the principle of domicile for direct Government taxes. § 4, however, provides: "All pay, pension, or provisional allowances which German soldiers, or civil servants, or their wives or families, draw from the treasury of one of the federated States, are only to be taxed within the State which has to make the payment." § 3 appoints the lex rei sitæ for landed property, and the exercise of trade or manufacture. The statute only gets rid of double taxation in the relations of the German Federated States to each other.

⁷ See Wharton, Dig. ii. § 204, on the point, that, in so far as public law is concerned, there is no objection to the taxation of foreigners who have resided a considerable time in the country, or who carry on business there, etc. But forced loans for the purpose of carrying on war against a foreign power must not be raised from foreigners. In general, however, the object of the taxation, e.g. the upkeep of schools, is of no importance. See despatch of the Secretary of State for the United States, of 1885, Wharton, Dig. ii. p. 515.

and of nationality as well, as we find, for instance, in the Prussian statute of 1st May 1851, § 16, which, to a certain extent, is still in force.

RETURNS FROM LAND.

§ 111. We must however recognise that, in the system of taxation generally, the person is not so much in view as his property. Although, therefore, as a matter of form, it is the person who is taxed, in truth it is always his property which has to bear it, which in a certain way has concentrated itself in him, and in this concentrated form, for instance, in the hands of a rich man, is seen to be an object which is particularly well able to give a good return. When we look at the matter in this way, we see, however, that one person may unite in himself several centres or masses of property. In so far as the personal enjoyment of them is concerned, the returns from these various masses of property are united in the same person, but their external appearance is that of complete independence one of the other. This happens, for instance, when a man owns lands, manufactories, or commercial establishments, in different countries. It seems in such a case fair that the revenue regulations should deal with these various masses of property as independent properties, and all the more so that, to a certain extent, the tax may be regarded as an equivalent for the protection which the State affords to the property, and that there is always a possibility that foreigners may possess in any one State a large number of landed estates, and masses of property of various kinds. In the latter case, if these were not each regarded as an independent whole, the State would have to go without a considerable share of the income tax arising from something produced on its own soil, and protected by its own laws and polity. We may also maintain, that in the domain of the law of taxation, we should be justified in assuming the possibility of a plurality of domiciles, or rather of a partial domicile, and all the more because the State, in freely conceding to foreigners the power of acquiring property in this country, has the better reason for securing absolutely for itself some share in the income that comes from the property that belongs to this country, as a fund for taxation. The State in the territory of which these masses of property are situated has, therefore, primarily the right of levying an income tax upon them. The State in which the person is really domiciled must give way, and can only raise an income tax from him, in so far as the income tax, at the rate at which it levies it generally, would exceed what has been paid to the foreign Government, if the person in question had his whole property in the State of the true domicile. On the other hand, however, the State in which a person has landed estate, etc., can only levy from him income tax upon the property which is in its own territory, and not upon his whole property. There may be, of course, something to say, as a matter of practical convenience, for leaving a trifling property in this country belonging to a foreigner free from taxation unless it exceeds a specified value, and for disregarding absolutely insignificant differences between the income taxes of the two countries.⁸

TAXES ON REAL PROPERTY.

§ 112. The so-called land tax (Grund-Steuer), and in general all taxation of landed property, houses, mines, etc., may in the same way be conceived as a method of taxing the income of a person. But in their legal form these imposts are seen to be taxes laid upon actually existing things. In this matter we have no concern with the nationality or the domicile of the person, and as these taxes, on account of the difficulties in the details of their imposition, generally assume a more or less stable character, their capitalised value is generally found to form in economics a deduction from the price at which real property is sold or bought, although that value may be no better than an approximation. It is right, therefore, that the amount of a land tax raised abroad, provided it has anything of a stable character, should not be taken into account as if it were so much income tax already paid to another country. This is the case e.g. in Prussia, even as regards land tax and buildings tax in Prussia itself.

It is also probably the case with other taxes on specified objects, e.g. articles of luxury, or to speak accurately, on the possession of such articles, that there is in the background an intention of affecting by that means the higher incomes of individuals: and it is even possible, by the multiplication of such special taxes on specified objects, to find a substitute for a general income tax. But the question cannot be decided by reference to any such remote intention. The tax hits native and foreign persons alike, so soon as their property within the territory takes the shape described in the statute.⁹ We can pay no heed to the plea that, viewed in the light of absolute justice, persons who are domiciled in State A, but own a number of taxable subjects in State B, may be oppressed, if State B taxes income by this means, while State A levies its tax upon income in the shape of a general income tax. If a system of taxation, which shall satisfy all the demands of ideal justice, must even within one and the same State be described as a pious aspiration, still less can we look for an international treatment of liability to taxation which shall completely answer our ideas of justice. All the remedy we can attain is one that will alleviate the broader forms of unequal and double taxation.

Taxes which affect transmissions of property as such, and the conduct of business,¹⁰ afford little material for questions of international law, except perhaps as regards certain equitable considerations, principally in intercourse upon the frontier, in which the principle of reciprocity ought to prevail.

⁹ Cf. art. ii. (13) of the Italian statute of 24th Aug. 1877, and the comments of Esperson, Jour. vi. p. 346.

STAMP DUTIES.

§ 113. In the matter of stamp duties,¹¹ a distinction must in truth be taken between cases in which the object is to affect the transmission of an asset of property from one hand to another, and those in which the conclusion of the bargain is the thing which it is intended to touch. In the former cases, the lex rei sitæ would necessarily be applied to immoveables, and the State in which the immoveable thing is situated would be entitled to levy the duty.¹² In the case of bargains, the object of which is the payment of a specified sum of money or, generally, the delivery of fungibles, that State in which the stipulated place of payment or delivery is situated would seem to be entitled to the duty.¹³ In the latter class of cases, the State in which the conclusion of the bargain took place, would raise the duty according to its own laws: as regards moveables, this may as a rule be assumed to be the real state of the law, even although as a matter of principle the duty may have been intended to fall upon the actual transmission of the property, because moveables have not as a rule such a clearly defined situs, that the revenue laws can with certainty attach themselves to it. But exceptions may occur, e.g. in reference to goods under official custody, and the example of the statute of the German Empire, of 29th May 1885, as to the levying of stamp duties, shows, in the 6th section, that in such matters regard may even be had to the place of residence of the contracting parties.¹⁴ If the legisla-

¹⁰ See a judgment of the Belgian Court of Jan. 1885 (Jour. xiv. p. 220), as to the taxation of foreign insurance companies in Belgium, according to the statutes of 30th July 1881 and 14th March 1885.

¹¹ As to English practice, see Foote, pp. 283-287.

¹⁴ "The regular duty must be paid upon all transactions of the kind which are concluded in this country."

"Transactions concluded abroad are liable to the duty if both parties reside in this country: if only one of them does so, only one-half of the amount of the duty has to be paid. In the case of mercantile firms, the question of residence is determined by the situs of the trading establishment which has concluded the transaction."

Transactions, too, which have taken place by means of correspondence, either by letter or by telegram, between a place in this country and a place abroad, are held to have been concluded abroad, cf. § 9: "The obligation to pay the duty falls primarily, (1) if the transaction is concluded through an agent who lives in this country, on the agent; otherwise, (2) if only one of the parties lives in this country, upon him."

These provisions appear to be sound in international relations, and to comply with equitable conditions in so far as taxes laid upon transactions on exchange are concerned.

ture¹⁵ in this matter frequently attempts to bring both the formal conclusion of the bargain and its actual performance in fact alike within the sweep of the tax, and so makes what is truly the leading idea of the impost give place to its formal expression—the object being to proceed with as much safety as possible, and not to be set at a disadvantage with foreign countries,—individuals have in such a case full right to adhere to the formal expression of the statute. To do violence to the meaning of the legislature which is at the bottom of the statute that has been enacted, is by no means such a transgression of the statute as can involve a penalty. For instance, if the parties, to avoid the heavy duty which State A has laid upon the conclusion of transactions, betake themselves to State B, and conclude their bargain there, that is not in truth an act in fraudem legis. It may be that the intention which lies at the root of the statute is to tax transactions which are to come into operation in the country which passed the statute. But what the legislator has done is to take, for some collateral reason or other, the conclusion of the bargain in his own country as the determinant fact.¹⁶ To speak of defrauding the law would, therefore, be quite wrong. If that were to be so, we should have to sanction a more liberal interpretation of such revenue statutes in favour of the public (which would perhaps be more correct), and, in consequence, refrain from taxing any transactions, which were by accident concluded in this country, but were intended to have their operation or to be carried out in another country.¹⁷

It would, besides, be quite right to take a distinction between stamps for the taxation of trade and the much smaller stamps necessary for sanctioning the production of papers before some official. A contract concluded abroad must be exempt from the former, unless in its nature it is intended to have its primary operation in this country. The latter kind of stamp, however, from which a contract, concluded in this country and already stamped, would be free, will affect foreign contracts which are produced in this country.¹⁸

¹⁵ Legal systems on this matter remind us not uncommonly, as regards international intercourse, to some degree of the usages of the Middle Ages as to tolls, in which there was no idea of any economic or equitable principles, but all that was thought of was as extensive a system of robbery and exaction as possible, against which commerce struggled with all conceivable resources of evasion.

¹⁷ See judgment of the 3rd Senate (Civil) of the German Imperial Court of 22nd Feb. 1881 (Dec. iv. p. 246): "As the question relates to a deed stamp, and a deed becomes liable to stamp duty, according to the stamp laws of Prussia, when it is completed by the subscription of both parties, and not till then, the law which decides as to the liability for stamp duty is the law of the place where the last subscription took place, where, in short, the deed as a stampable deed came into being." The provisions of the new Imperial Stamp Statute, cited in note 14, are substantially more sound and just. [But see Jour. xvi. p. 827, for a report of a decision by the Court of Cassation that the lex rei sitæ will determine whether an asset of property (in this case a concession for mineral workings) is or is not moveable, in a question as to the duty to be imposed upon a transmission of that asset carried out in France.]

¹⁸ The law may, no doubt, by express enactment, affect bargains which are intended to operate in this country or to be founded on here in some particular way (e.g. by being produced

SUCCESSION DUTIES.

§ 114. The subject of succession duty, which at the present day is often a matter of great importance, deserves separate treatment.¹⁹ It may be figured as an equivalent for the protection extended by the State to the transmission of the right of the predecessor to his heirs or legatees.²⁰ But this conception, the result of which would be to find that State, in whose territory each asset of the succession was situated, entitled to the duty, would be satisfied by a comparatively trifling payment. It could never justify a payment of a high percentage, and indeed not even of a percentage at all, in the case of a large succession; and again, it would never be reconciled with the graduated scale of duty that is exacted, according as the heir or legatee is closely or distantly related to the deceased. Another possible way of looking at the duty is to regard it as a recompense for the trouble of the officials who have to regulate the succession. In that case the lex fori would rule, and that State would be entitled to the duty, whose officials undertook the regulation of the succession. But this conception, too, fails if the duty is considerable, or if it is graduated. The only thing left is that any considerable succession duty should be regarded as being either an accumulated income tax, or as a joint right of succession belonging to the commonwealth, which presses especially heavily upon distant relations of the deceased, or upon persons who are not related to him at all. It is not at all inconsistent with the notion of an accumulated income tax, that at the same time a yearly income tax is being raised from the property of the living, for formidable difficulties may be urged against an unduly heavy tax of the latter description, whereas the postponed levy of it on the occasion of the opening of a succession, and in the guise of a succession to public officers or to notaries). Cf. judgment of the Court at Pontoise, of 13th March 1879 (Jour. vi. p. 391). The Prussian stamp law of 7th May 1882, § 12, subsec. 2 ad fin., provides: "If natives of this country have concluded abroad a bargain relating to an object that is in this country which is liable to stamp duty, they must, within fourteen days after their return, take out and pay for the appropriate stamped documents." On this latter provision, see the judgment of the 3rd Senate of the Imperial Tribunal of 21st Feb. 1884 (Dec. xi. No. 54).

But it is too large a step to declare, as a judgment of the French Court of Cassation of 8th May 1882 (Jour. ix. p. 524) does, that a legal document executed abroad is liable to stamp duty, if it is only to be used as a voucher for the accounts of a joint-stock company, and is thus concerned with nothing beyond the internal management of that company. By a decision of the Court of Cassation, of 5th Feb. 1884 (Jour. xi. p. 180), the French duty on insurance policies must be paid upon policies entered into by French companies abroad.

duty, will be less felt, and is more easily managed. If it is regarded as a postponed income tax, the State in whose dominions the deceased was domiciled will be entitled to levy it, putting aside those items of property which, in a question of income tax, also follow the lex rei sitæ.^{21 22} If we adopt the notion of a joint right of succession belonging to the fisk, it will be more natural to look upon the State to which the deceased belonged by nationality in the technical sense, as entitled to levy the tax, and it would also be the law of this State that would determine the rate of duty. But these two conceptions cannot be sharply separated from each other. Even in the case of the annual income tax, this point of view may be recognised as having some influence, viz. the view that the commonwealth thereby to a certain extent proclaims that it is entitled to share the enjoyment of the fruits of the incomes of private citizens, although it does not claim the right within the meaning of many of our modern economists, "corriger les fortunes," i.e. to regulate the amount of the incomes of private individuals. That descendants of the deceased should be free of all duty, or that his near relations should be more lightly taxed, might then be looked upon as an apparently equitable modification in the increased severity of the imposition of postponed income tax in the shape of succession duty. Perhaps, then, the best course for international law to take, is an intermediate course which can, it is true, only be adopted under the authority of treaties.²³ Let that State to which the deceased belonged by nationality,

In the year 1882, the French Government was successful in resisting the claim of the Canton Waadt, to take into computation for the purposes of their succession duty, in the case of a person who had died in the canton, immoveable property situated in France. (See the report of the French Direction générale de l'enregistrement given in Jour. ix. p. 607.)

In Louisiana, for the purposes of succession duty, estates which are situated in different States are regarded as separate properties (Jour. iii. pp. 131, 132). According to a decision of the Civil Court of Mexico, of 20th September 1875 (Jour. iii. p. 225), securities over foreign estates are not reckoned for the purposes of the Mexican succession duty.

²² If the fisk of the country where the assets are situated is held to be entitled to levy succession duty on immoveables, as a consequence the lex rei sitæ must be the sole judge of whether a relationship by adoption is a ground for total or partial exemption; and if the lex rei sitæ knows nothing of the institute of adoption, then in a question of exemption adoption cannot be placed on a parity with natural relationship, although by the personal law of the deceased, or his heirs, they stand on an equal footing. So, too, Lehr, Jour. ix. p. 291, and judgment of the Swiss Federal Tribunal, of 16th January 1866, Jour. xiv. p. 376.

be, as a matter of principle, declared to be entitled to levy the succession duty, but let the State of the deceased's domicile²⁴ have a preferable right if the deceased has lived a considerable time, say five years, continuously there, reserving, of course, the competency of the State in which immoveable property is situated. That moveables situated in a foreign country should be exempt from the tax which is imposed by the law of the domicile, is unreasonable. It is a mistake to discover, in the taxation of these moveables, an invasion of the sovereign rights of the State in which they happen to be. We are not here dealing with a tax, which affects the objects as such, but rather with a tax which is laid upon an imaginary unity of property according to its value. Although legal systems used to pay more attention to the accidental situs of the assets, in recent times the opposite, and in our opinion the correct, theory is making itself more and more felt, viz. that moveables which are in a foreign country should be reckoned as part of the taxable estate.²⁵ The French statute of 1871 takes up this position in reference to claims of debt belonging to the succession, while the Italian statute of 1866 directs its attention to the place where the claim is payable.²⁶ But the French law is plainly a onesided law in favour of the fisk, in respect that it holds moveable property subject to the French succession

²⁴ In France, by the statute of 23rd August 1871, § 4, the actual domicile rules; the French fisk will draw its "droits de mutation" from the succession of a foreigner deceased, even if the foreigner has not had formal authority for establishing his domicile in France. In this case, the duty is leviable from all foreign assets, and even upon simple debts that are payable abroad, which belong to the succession; it is not, however, leviable upon corporeal articles that are in a foreign country. Before the statute of 1871, the foreign assets were in such a case not liable to the French duty, in accordance with the maxim, "En matière d'impôt la loi n'a d'empire que sur le territoire qu'elle régit." (See Jour. v. p. 374, vi. p. 305, vi. p. 476, and xi. pp. 72, 73.) The question whether a claim of debt belongs to this country or to some other, is not an easy one to solve, and in our opinion cannot be solved except arbitrarily. (See on this subject the sketch by a French financial officer in Jour. iii. p. 258.) See, too, Lehr in Jour. x. p. 13, who rightly criticises the French system as illogical. One must choose, according to him, between the German system (the home of the deceased, or of the creditor, as the case may be), and the system which makes the situs of the asset, the residence of the debtor, the rule. A combination of the two systems, he thinks, would be unjust, and would necessarily involve double taxation. He himself declares in favour of the lex rei sitæ. But in no case should a mere residence, as distinguished from domicile, furnish a ground for levying succession duty. The French "droits de succession" have, since a decision of the administration of 1883, been levied upon policies of life assurance, paid by French companies upon contracts made abroad, notwithstanding that the company may have subjected itself to the jurisdiction of the foreign court in the matter, because the real security for the transaction is in France (Jour. xi. p. 276).

duty, provided that it can be considered as situated in France,²⁷ although the succession itself is not subject to the law of France. The English system²⁸ levies legacy duty upon the whole moveable estate left by a person domiciled in England, wherever it is situated, but, on the other hand, does not levy it upon the moveable estate in England of a domiciled foreigner. Succession duty, again, is an impost upon property settled by means of a trust, and this affects property which is in England without reference to the domicile of the settler, the temporary owner or the successor.

TAXATION OF JURISTIC PERSONS.

§ 115. One special question, which in the present day is of great importance, is the taxation of juristic persons. It cannot admit of doubt that these persons must as much as ordinary individuals pay property taxes, taxes on manufactures, and stamp duties, on account of their different transactions. On the other hand, juristic persons have no real income for their own enjoyment. Their income does not in truth benefit themselves, but the individuals of which they are made up. The juristic persons are so far mere conduit pipes. The reasonable course, therefore, would be not to subject them to an income tax, or rather to take the income of juristic persons into account only in so far as it appears in the income of different individuals as part of their income, or to credit the individual in his income tax account with the amount which he has already paid as a partner of the juristic person, i.e. to leave alone the income which he draws as such partner.²⁹ In fact, what difference can it make to this question whether twenty people carry on a trade as simple socii or as shareholders?³⁰ It

²⁷ As to the way in which this is worked out in France, see Jour. vi. p. 476.

³⁰ In spite of the words of the third section of the German Imperial Statute to do away with double taxation (13th May 1870), the German Imperial Court (Sen. i.) on 11th Feb. 1885 (Seuffert, 40, No. 210, see, too, to the same effect, the criminal Senate, iii. 26th Feb. 1883, Entsch. in Strafsachen, viii. p. 132) held that the income of a person consisting of dividends might be taken into account for income tax at his domicile, although the income of the juristic person had already been subjected to income tax at the place at which it had its seat or carried on its trade. The words of the statute are: "Landed property or a going business, and the income resulting from such sources, can only be taxed by that State in which the property is situated, or the business carried on." The judgment does not overlook the fact that in truth there will be a double taxation; on the one hand, however, it takes up the technical view that in the eye of the law the juristic person and the shareholder are distinct legal personalities, and, in the second place, it proceeds upon the object which the statute was aimed at, and the preliminary proceedings before it was passed. Result: a rich man, who is the sole owner of a manufactory will not be right to affect juristic persons by an income tax except in so far as the lex rei sitæ is taken as a basis for its imposition. The taxation of juristic persons is on principle only defensible in so far as the taxation is regarded as an impost on production, or on particular objects, or on trade. But then taxation of that kind is no proper income tax. If, however, we find that many legal systems, even when they are dealing with the concerns of their own country alone, frequently impose a double tax on income, in so far as it comes to the individual through the medium of a juristic person,³¹ we need not wonder that, when international affairs are in question, individuals are often forced to pay twice over, that the fisk may not be prejudiced.³²

DUTIES ON COUPONS.

§ 116. Seeing that in practice so much confusion prevails between taxes on production or returns, and taxes on income, there is some justification for holding juristic persons liable in income tax, or, as the case may be, holders of shares liable to income tax under the head of a tax upon their coupons, without heed to the question whether the person who draws the income from coupons is liable himself in income tax in respect of this. The shareholder does, however, own indirectly an asset in the country which yields a return. On the other hand, it is a plain injustice to exact a coupon tax upon debentures, however much in vogue that mode of taxation may be at the present time. For by such a tax persons are affected, who seem strictly not to be liable to income tax in this country, either on the ground of nationality or of domicile. There is in the German State A, will pay no tax upon his income from it in the German State B, in which he is domiciled: a poor widow, who owns a couple of shares in a joint-stock undertaking in State B, must pay over again in State B, in which she resides. (The judgment of the old Supreme Court of Appeal at Lübeck, on 31st Oct. 1874, was to the opposite effect, and in my opinion sounder. See Seuffert, 37, No. 33.)

³² The English income tax is in truth a kind of produce tax, which attaches to the income at its very source, being levied on the product itself. The person who receives the income which has thus paid the tax at its source has not to pay again. Therefore it is entirely right that the income of juristic persons which are domiciled abroad should be subject to income tax in England, but only in so far as the income has been made in England. (On this subject, and on the method of computation, see Foote, Jour. ix. p. 481.) On the other hand, the Queen's Bench Division decided (Jour. x. p. 199; Erichsen v. Last, 23rd March 1881, L.R. 8, Q. B. Div. 414) that a company domiciled abroad must pay income tax for telegraphic dues, raised in England, although these dues were received for submarine cables, and not for cables actually situated in England, and a company domiciled in England must pay the tax upon income made abroad (see Cesena Sulphur Co. v. Nicholson, 1876, L.R. 1 Ex. D. 428; Westlake, Rev. viii. p. 481). Such an impost goes altogether beyond the limits of a produce tax. Lately the Queen's Bench has found that foreign public trading companies are liable to income tax, in so far as they carry on business in England by means of agents domiciled there [Gilbertson v. Fergusson, 1881, L.R. 7, Q. B. Div. 562. Werle & Co. v. Colquhoun, 1888, L. R. 20, Q. B. D. 753]. See the communication by Thomas Barclay to the Economiste Français, of 2nd June 1888.

a certain semblance of the creditor having in his debtor a profit-yielding subject. But this is a mere semblance. The true profit-yielding subject is that which the debtor has constructed out of the borrowed capital, be it a railway, a manufactory, or the orderly and secure constitution of the State itself, in so far as the money may have been borrowed by the State to meet its own general requirements. But this actual subject is already liable to taxation, and is taxed. To tax the creditor, without considering whether he is in any true sense personally liable to income tax, and is therefore in a position to credit himself in his income tax account with the amount already paid upon his debenture, is an arbitrary proceeding,³³ which had its origin in the practice of States, which under pressure of financial difficulties sought in this way to be rid of a part of their indebtedness. Its material unfairness betrays itself in the express undertaking now so often given to State creditors, as well as to creditors of companies, that the payment of interest shall be free from all such duties. The taxation of coupons of joint-stock undertakings³⁴ does not stand altogether in the same position, because one who holds a share in an undertaking, which has its situs abroad, may expect higher returns some day, if the circumstances of the country improve, while the creditor can never look for more than the guaranteed interest. Those States, however, which have had recourse to such coupon taxes will have, as matter of fact, to make good the tax in the case of future loans, which are not expressly declared to be free from the tax, by giving their creditors some other more favourable conditions.

The State, besides, should not tax foreign creditors of debtors of its own country, e.g. corporations, and in particular railway companies, any more than it should tax its own foreign creditors.

It is an entirely different question whether the creditor has action against his debtor for the full amount of his coupons, if the State in which the latter—a railway or other joint-stock company—is domiciled, lays a duty upon the coupons of the company, draws the duty directly from the company, giving it a right, all of course in a way authorised by statute, to deduct the amount of the tax in settling with its creditors. As a practical matter, this question can only be raised if it be possible for the creditor to find a competent court in another State, e.g. where the company has promised to cash the coupons, i.e. specially undertaken to pay. It does not follow that, although the creditor has suffered a material injustice, he may not be obliged formally to acquiesce in it. The question rather is, By what law is the obligation to be tested? In a judgment of the 6th Civil Chamber of the Landgericht at Berlin, on 25th September 1887,³⁵ in the matter of Ottermann against the Russian Naphtha Company, Nobel Brothers, this was the point that was made prominent. In our view it is certain that, by fixing a place of payment in some other country, it was not meant to be inferred that the debtor submitted himself in each and every respect to the law of the place of payment. The judgment referred to is to the opposite effect, and it notes that in such cases foreign capitalists are expressly enticed to take part in the loan, by the exclusion of the operation of the law of the debtor's country, implied in the selection of a place of payment or performance within the legal domain of the creditor. It is not, however, practicable to withdraw at will an obligation, which really belongs to a particular territory, from that territory for all effects and purposes, and to save it from the operation of the legal system which prevails there. A judgment of condemnation, pronounced by the court of the country where payment is to be made, will in many cases be a brutum fulmen.

On this subject, we may notice the interesting judgment of the Ger. Imp. Ct. (i.), of 21st June 1888 (Dec. xxii. No. 4, p. 19), in the case of Ottermann against the Russian Naphtha Production Company. The grounds of decision, in conformity with the principles which we have just expounded, proceed on the consideration that a duty on coupons cannot be justified as against foreign creditors upon the footing of an income tax. But the judges lay down, at the same time, what I think a dangerous doctrine, viz. they make the legal possibility of imposing a tax substantially dependent on whether or not the State possesses the power of levying it. I hold that it is inadmissible so to identify right and might: it would justify any caprice you like to imagine. The inference which they draw from that doctrine in the particular case is, that, as the place of payment was within the jurisdiction of the German Empire, the Russian Government ceased to have the power, and the defenders' company must be found liable in full payment, as indeed it was. I should have more favour for a ground of judgment of which there are glimpses or indications in the exposition of the grounds on which the court proceeded, viz. that duties of this kind subsequently imposed on the creditor must be regarded as inconsistent with bona fides, and unworthy of international recognition. But, see a previous judgment of the same court, on 4th October 1882 (Dec. ix. No. 2, p. 3), in which, following the foreign law (Austrian) which was there in question, the deduction in question was declared unlawful in relation to the foreign creditors of a private company. (See below, the discussion of the subject of payment in connection with the law of obligations.)

NOTE D. ON §§ 109-116.

LIABILITY OF FOREIGNERS AND FOREIGN COMPANIES TO TAXATION.

[The imposition of income tax in Great Britain is regulated by the Property and Income Tax Act of 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. c. 34). By § 2, schedule D, of that Act, duty is payable "for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom, from any profession, trade, employment or vocation, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere;" and again, in the same schedule, "for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person whatever, whether a subject of Her Majesty or not, although not resident within the United Kingdom, from any property whatever in the United Kingdom, or any profession, trade, employment, or vocation exercised within the United Kingdom.]

The two conditions, therefore, either of which will warrant the imposition of the duty are, (1) residence in the United Kingdom, in which case the person resident is liable to be taxed on his whole income, wherever it takes its rise; and (2) the carrying on of business in the United Kingdom, in which case the profits of the business are liable to the tax, although the person drawing the profits be no subject of Her Majesty, and be resident abroad. What is true of persons is true of legal persons, and, among them, of trading companies.

As regards the question of residence, the courts have held that a sailor, who is himself absent for the whole year, may yet be liable, if he has a dwelling-house in Great Britain, in which his wife and family live (Rogers v. Sol. of Inland Revenue, June 28, 1879, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. vi. 1109). Again, a British subject who had his only place of business and two houses, a town house and a country house, in Italy, was owner of an estate in Scotland, where he lived for nearly four months in the year. The court held that a man might have several residences, and that this person had a residence in Scotland, and so was liable in income tax. As a person carrying on business in Italy and resident there, he had paid taxes to the Italian Government, including a tax on the profits of his business. In spite of this, no deduction was allowed to him in Great Britain (Lloyd v. Sol. of Inland Revenue, March 12, 1884, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xi. 687). The principle followed in this case had been determined in 1817 in England, in the case of Att. Gen. v. Coote (4, Price, 183), on the terms of an older statute, similarly worded.

Under the second head, viz. the carrying on of business in England, several cases have been decided in the English courts, some of which have already been cited in notes appended to the text. Foreign firms, i.e. firms with foreign domiciles, or consisting entirely of foreigners, with their head offices in a foreign country, have been held liable to pay income tax if they did business in Great Britain by means of agents there, who made contracts with British subjects. The amount assessable is estimated on the transactions concluded by these agents. The principle is stated by Jessel, M.R., in the case of Erichsen v. Last (Telegraph Company of Copenhagen), 1881, L.R. 8, Q.B. Div. 414. The company there had stations in Great Britain, at which telegrams were handed in and money taken from British subjects, but none of their lines were on British territory. The Master of the Rolls says that contracts with British subjects made in England are sufficient to raise the liability to the tax, and illustrates the case by putting the instance of foreign carriers, whose services to their customers were performed entirely out of this country. Still, if they took orders in Great Britain they would be liable. This principle is adopted in the subsequent cases of Pommery v. Apthorpe, 1886 (56, L.J. Q.B. Div. 155), and Werle v. Colquhoun, 1888 (L.R. 20, Q.B. Div. 753), which were both cases of foreign wine merchants, who made sales in this country through agents. On the other hand, a firm established at New York, where it had its principal seat, with a branch establishment in England, at which, however, no sales were made, but only purchases of goods for exportation to America, where they were sold, and where all the profits were made, was held not to be liable to the tax (Sulley v. Att. Gen. 1860, 5, Hurl. and N. 111). If such a company were to be liable, any customer of an English trader would be liable, a result which the Chief Justice (Cockburn) said would be most serious for English trade.

As regards death duties, there is not much to be added to the observations of Mr Westlake (pp. 121 et seq.). The distinctions there drawn between probate duty, i.e. the tax on the whole estate which passes to the executor or administrator appointed in Great Britain, who takes up the estate of a dead man; legacy duty, the tax levied in the case of persons domiciled in Great Britain upon the entire amount of their legacies and residue, whether these are or are not received under a British grant of administration or confirmation; and succession duty, or the tax upon the transmission of property in consequence of the death of some person, who was not the absolute owner, and from whom the person now taking the property does not derive his title, that title being conferred by some British settlement—these distinctions are well marked and illustrated by decisions.

That legacy duty is not exigible in the case of persons domiciled abroad is certain (Att. Gen. v. Thomson, 1845, 4, Bell's app. 1, and Wallace v. Att. Gen. 1865, L.R. 1, Ch. App. 1). But, on the other hand, where the estate is placed in trust under a British settlement, i.e. where it stands in the names of trustees in consols or other property which has a quasi local settlement, then succession duty is exigible upon it (Att. Gen. v. Campbell, 1872, 5, E. & J. App. 524). The same principle was applied in the court of Scotland in the recent case of Duncan's Trs. v. McCracken, March 20, 1888 (Ct. of Sess. Reps. xv. 638), where an estate settled by a domiciled foreigner in a Scots trust, i.e. in Scotsmen as trustees, who invested it in the public funds, for life rent to one and fee to another person named, was held liable to succession duty on the death of the liferenter. So, too, in the case of Littledale's Trs. v. Ld. Advocate, Nov. 24, 1882 (Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. x. 224), an estate which had been conveyed by a trust inter vivos to trustees, the majority of whom were domiciled in Scotland, and had by these trustees been invested in heritable security in Scotland, for the liferent of the truster, and on his death for his children in fee, was held liable to succession duty on the death of the truster.]

Third Book.

THE FORMS OF LEGAL TRANSACTIONS.

THE RULE "locus regit actum." ORIGIN OF THIS RULE a priori?

§ 117. It is a rule admitted by almost every authority,¹ since the times of the Middle Ages, that the form² of a legal transaction must be recognised as good all the world over, if it is in harmony with the laws of the place in which it was entered into.³ But yet there are disputes as to the extension of this rule to all forms, or its restriction to certain specified forms, and also as to whether the observance of the lex loci actus is to be exclusive or only permissive.

Just as little unanimity is there as to the grounds on which this rule can be justified. According to some, a distinction must be drawn between the laws relating to persons, to things, and to acts, and no other law can be applied to the last class than that which obtains at the place where the transaction is entered into. This is the old statute theory.⁴ According to the theory of others, all persons, in so far as the transactions into which they enter are concerned, are necessarily subject to the authority of the State in whose territory these transactions take place, and the rule in

² This rule is extended to the substance of the legal transaction. In this paragraph we have not as yet anything to do with that matter.

⁴ Vinnius, Comm. in Instit. ii. § 14; Phillips, D. Privatr. i. p. 192; Matthæus, de auctionibus, i. 21, No. 38; (v. Grolmann) Ueber Holographische Testamente, p. 14.

question immediately follows from this consideration.⁵ Many derive the rule, not from any forced subjection of the parties to the laws of the country where the transaction takes place, but from a voluntary submission on their part (Autonomy).⁶ Finally, there are others who refer the rule to a general customary law.^{7 8} This view, to which most modern authors have given their adherence, is the only true one.

The first ground assigned proves too much, and, therefore, nothing. Since all legal relations are truly determined by acts of some kind, the law of the place in which that act is done must be the only one that can be applied in international law—a position which the adherents of this view do not adopt.

The second rests, in the first place, upon a false assumption, and if this assumption be conceded, upon an erroneous conclusion, as Wächter has shown.

The assumption that the State desires to subject all acts that take place in its territory to its own laws is incorrect; for it does not follow that it desires to do this in every relation because it has the power to do it; and, if it did desire it, the question would still remain why this determination should be respected by another State in which the transaction may be put forward for recognition.⁹

But it is just as difficult to acknowledge the soundness of the third ground. The laws which prescribe the forms of legal transactions do not leave anything to the will of the parties. If the law requires a particular form, the parties cannot agree to contract without it; and, in the same way, they cannot agree to contract according to the forms of any foreign country they please.¹⁰

Before, however, we go to prove that this rule of law owes its origin

No. 8; Kori, iii. p. 4; Archiv. für die Civ. Praxis, vol. xxvii. p. 309. Those also are to be reckoned among this class who treat the settlement of the question by the lex loci actus as something natural, e.g. Phillips, i. p. 192.

Cf. also Alef, No. 44; Wheaton, § 90, p. 121; Burge, i. p. 29.

¹⁰ Wächter, ii. p. 406.

solely to an universal law of custom, which has won its way to the front by reason of its convenience, it will be necessary to take Laurent's theory (ii. § 233) into consideration. He has undertaken to demonstrate in quite a peculiar way a priori the absolute validity of the rule "locus regit actum," and he has in some quarters found disciples. He argues that, as the forms of legal transactions are intended to serve as a proof of a free and genuine declaration of the consent of the parties being given to the transactions, it is natural and obvious that the legal system of the country, in which this declaration of will or consent takes place, should prescribe the forms and securities necessary for the attainment of this object. This conclusion, however, which moves Laurent to give to the rule "locus regit actum" an imperative or coercitive force—although he must needs set it aside in some matters, e.g. in the transmission of real rights, and in order to set it aside must make the most artificial distinctions¹¹—is after all a fallacy. No legal system has any interest in the proof of a legal transaction except that one in the territories of which it is sought to put it in force. The law of the country in which it was made¹² has no interest in it, and, if we are to speak of what is natural, every court would test the proof by its own legal system, i.e. the lex fori. Is it to be supposed that the proof of a transaction between Germans, concluded in Africa, can possibly be tested in Germany by African usages? Can any one believe that the Romans would ever have recognised the testament of a Roman citizen if made in any but the Roman form?

THE RULE "locus regit actum" RESTS SOLELY ON CUSTOM.

§ 118. It is in fact impossible, it is a vain endeavour, to trace the origin of the rule "locus regit actum" a priori, or to show that it follows as a conclusion from any first principles of law. The form of a legal transaction is one of the necessary conditions of that transaction itself, and must therefore be judged by the same law as that to which the particular legal transaction itself is subject.¹³ All that it is possible, then, for us to do is to refer the rule "locus regit actum" to a general law of custom.¹⁴

¹¹ Cf. § 240 and also § 255, in which the act of recognition of an enfant naturel is treated, as regards form, as being dependent on the Statut personnel. How that is to be reconciled with the recognition of the sovereignty of the country in which the act is done, is a riddle the solution of which Laurent has not as yet given us.

¹³ To this effect, see v. Wyss, Zeitschr. f. schweiz. R. ii. p. 97; Haus, § 84; Muheim, pp. 89, 90; Phillimore, § 625; Judgment of the Supreme Court of Wolfenbüttel, 8th March 1858 (Seuffert, 20, No. 1).

The existence of such a law has already been demonstrated by Wächter by means of numerous quotations, and we have the less hesitation in accepting the fact of its existence, since there are such weighty considerations of convenience to explain the origin of such custom. The origin of it, however, did come about in the following way.

There are some passages in the law of Rome which at first sight seem to imply it; and we may believe that there happened here, what happened with so many other passages which were employed in the Middle Ages and later to establish quite arbitrarily rules of law that have a very recent origin. However, in the present case we have not to deal with a rule of Germanic law, which required to be strengthened and saved from destruction by an appeal to the law of Rome; this new rule was rather in plain contradiction to earlier legal theories, for according to them the forms of legal acts were determined by the personal law of the contracting parties, and that so absolutely, that if these parties were subject to different personal laws, the forms of both had to be observed. It is therefore highly improbable that this rule was in this way read into the Roman law, as no doubt did happen in other cases.

It is often laid down, that this proposition of law took its origin in the sixteenth century, or not much earlier. In reality, however, it is considerably older. As early as the days of Cinus of Pistorium, for instance, it is spoken of as *communis opinio*¹⁵ that the lex loci contractus is to determine the litis decisoria (in contradistinction to the litis ordinatoria, i.e. the rules for the form and course of procedure); that author hesitates only in the case of the form of a testament, and remarks that opinions are divided on that question, some being inclined to respect the law that prevails at the place where it was drawn up, some the law of the place where the thing conveyed is situated. The same deliverances may be found in Albericus de Rosate (de Stat. p. ii. qu. 8), Petr. de Bellapertica,¹⁶ Paulus de Castr.,¹⁷ Ralph Fulgosius,¹⁸ and Petr. de Ravenna.^{19 20}

It is a fundamental principle of all these older writers, as we have already noticed, that a Statutum binds none but subjects, and accordingly the legal transactions concluded by foreigners in this country are not in themselves subject to the laws of this country. But they looked upon the rule "locus regit actum" as an exception, and for the most part justified it by the remark that the sollennitates actus belongs to jurisdictio voluntaria, and by a generally recognised axiom that the transactions attested before one court must be held by all other courts as well attested. (Cf. Cinus de ²⁰ Durandus, too, Spec. Jur. L. ii. p. 2, de testamentorum edit, § 12, No. 16, discusses the forms of testaments. Bartholus de Salic in L. 1, C. de S. Trin. No. 12; Bald Ubald, ad L. 2, C. de S. Trin. No. 83; Bartholus, ad L. 1, C. de S. Trin. No. 14, proposes that the lex loci contractus should alone determine the sollennitates actus.

Pist., Petr. de Ravenna, Bald de Ubald, Durand.) Nothing, therefore, is more likely than that the rule "locus regit actum" arose in this way. No other form of concluding legal transactions was in use in the Middle Ages than a judicial completion of them;²¹ where private documents are found, the form of the transaction is not determined by the document; all that is thereby effected is the preservation of proof of the transaction. These lawyers had no occasion, therefore, in discussing this rule, to take any notice of private documents.²²

Now, as far as regards the conclusion of contracts before a court, it is plain that the object of this form, by which a legal transaction was either concluded in open court, or, by being recorded in the books of the court, was placed within the reach of every man's knowledge, was either to give in the particular case a special attestation to the transaction which was held to be necessary, or at the same time to give it a special publicity. This end, which the prescribed judicial forms had in view, taken along with the theory that prevailed in the Middle Ages, that the emperor was the true superior of all Christendom, and all judges derived their jurisdiction, at least indirectly, from him, necessarily caused the attestation of a legal transaction before any judge in Christendom to be recognised as valid by any other tribunal. An appeal might also be made to the well-known axiom of Roman law: "Acta facta coram uno iudice fidem faciunt apud alium." It was, however, natural that every judge should, in attesting any such transaction, proceed according to the laws and rules of process recognised in his own country, and if there had been any attempt to recognise the variety of particular usages and customs, the benefit of these public instruments would have been very much restricted, so endlessly various, at least in detail, were the forms of judicial procedure.

To these considerations we may add this fact. The forms which were used in the judicial completion of a contract were, as a rule, formed upon the model of the forms of process; a striking example of these is the introduction of the instrumenta quarentigiata, by which the creditor was empowered to recover his debt forthwith from the debtor, who was by anticipation formally adjudged to be due the debt, by means of a parata executio (Briegleb, i. p. 67). Now, no one has ever doubted that the forms of a suit must be determined by the laws of the place where the court is situated. Nothing was more natural than to extend this rule to processes

According to Baumeister (Hamburgisches Privatr. i. § 10, p. 64), private instruments were first used as articles of evidence in Hamburg at the end of the fifteenth century.

where voluntary jurisdiction was conferred, if these processes were conducted according to the forms of litigious jurisdiction.²³

What was true for judicial transactions would easily be extended to deeds or transactions before witnesses, in the confused state of legal conceptions in the Middle Ages.²⁴ The tribunal here really consisted of a number of credible persons who were members of the community and could bear testimony to all that passed, while the presiding judge had no duty save to attend to the formal conduct of the business.

THE RULE NOT APPLICABLE TO THE CONSTITUTION OR DISCHARGE OF REAL RIGHTS IN IMMOVEABLE OR IN MOVEABLE PROPERTY.

§ 119. This explanation is confirmed by the exception, which all writers of the Middle Ages make, that in conferring real rights to landed property the laws of the place where the property is situated alone decide.²⁵

Considerations of expediency, which we can certainly adduce for this exception, could not very easily have produced a communis opinio on this point. But in accordance with the theory of development which we have assumed, the matter is very simply explained by the fact that in the later Middle Ages, in litigious suits and processes of voluntary jurisdiction about real property, the tribunal of the place where the thing was, was alone competent, and therefore the forms in use before another court could never enter the question at all. We shall see that where the heir was held to be an universal successor, and in that character to represent the person of his predecessor in all questions of property, and where, therefore, the right of succession did not substantially depend upon the nature of the particular assets of the estate, the forms of testaments were subject to the general rule "locus regit actum;" but where, on the contrary, the law of succession did no more than supply a particular means of acquiring articles that belonged to the dead man, the forms of testaments were determined by the lex rei sitæ.

The acquisition of real rights in moveables and the loss of these necessarily constitute, as we shall hereafter see, a second exception. That these are but seldom mentioned by authors of the Middle Ages and of a later date is, however, explained by the fact that, on the one hand, in the Middle Ages there were many actual and legal obstacles²⁶ in the way of ²³ Cf. the discussion in Cinus de Pistorio in L. un C. de confessis; Bartholus, in L. 15, D. de re judicata, 42, 1, § 1, No. 8.

²⁴ Savigny gives an instance, History of Roman Law, i. § 27, p. 128. As a general rule, however, the imperfect organisation of the machinery of States in the Middle Ages makes the distinction between witnesses and an official a very doubtful one. If, for instance, it is provided by statute that transactions of a particular kind shall take place before two members of council, who may be chosen at will by the parties, are these persons witnesses, or do they constitute an official board?

²⁵ Cf. infra, the discussion of real rights.

²⁶ We may remember the axiom: "Hand must guard hand."

following out by process real rights to particular pieces of moveable property, and such questions therefore were not likely to be brought before foreign courts; on the other hand, there were not many instances of forms to hamper the transference of real rights to moveables. In the single case that is pertinent in this connection, if the heir is not held to be an universal successor, and where therefore we may consider what right can be acquired by testament in the moveable assets of a succession, the fiction, which all writers of the Middle Ages who have discussed the conflict of statutes of succession have adopted, comes into play—viz. that moveables follow the person, and therefore are held to be present on the spot where the testator declares his last will, at the moment when he draws up his testament.²⁷

OTHER LIMITATIONS? LIMITATION TO INSTRUMENTS OF OFFICIALS OR NOTARIES? CAN THE RULE BE MAINTAINED IN ANY COMPREHENSIVE SENSE?

§ 120. The expressions used by the oldest authors on this subject make it quite plain that they do not confine the rule to the form of judicial or even notarial instruments. Any such limitation, in view of the impossibility of distinguishing between the character of a witness and that of an official person, would in reality have been inconsistent.²⁸ Almost all the authorities lay down the rule in that wider sense, in which it extends to extra-judicial forms, and we can have no hesitation in affirming a customary law in this sense also.²⁹

²⁷ On this question see infra, discussion on the law of succession.

A judgment of the Supreme Court at Berlin, of 3rd April 1857 (Striethorst, xxiii. 352), remarks that it must not be supposed that the Allgem. Preuss. Land Recht intended to do away with the rule of common law—viz.: "the form of every legal transaction is to be determined by the laws of the place where it is made"—because it did not set out an universal rule to the same effect. Cf. judgment of the Supreme Court of Berlin, of 13th June 1857 (Striethorst, 24, p. 370). Blunt-

The limitation which some authors (e.g. Thöl) impose upon this rule, by confining it to instruments executed before foreign officials,³⁰ must be rejected as irreconcilable with actual existing usage. It would, besides, do much to lessen the benefits of the rule, which are universally admitted; legal transactions could in that state of matters only be entered into in a foreign country before an official, according to the forms in use there. No doubt it may be objected (Thöl) that the object of many of the laws dealing with the forms of legal instruments, in so far as expediency is concerned, is to be explained on the footing that their intention is to prescribe the form of legal transactions for all natives, without making any distinction as to the place where the legal act took place. But this reasoning, if it were universally applicable, would make even the transactions entered into before foreign magistrates invalid, if it should happen that these officials did not make use of the same formalities as ourselves. The forms which our laws require to be observed in instruments executed by our magistrates, are held to be as essential for the attestation and legality of these acts as those which they prescribe for the validity of private transactions. What is true of one class must therefore apply to the other also. Quid juris, if native law does not permit some particular legal transaction except before a court, while it is impossible in the foreign country to complete it schli, D. Privatr., i. p. 12, iii. 1; Renaud, D. Privatr. i. § 42, iii.; Oppenheim, Völkerrecht, p. 402; Treaty between Prussia and Lippe, of 18th March 1857, art. 32 (Prussian Collection of Statutes, 1857, p. 289); Civil Code for the Kingdom of Saxony, § 9: "The forms to be observed in a legal transaction, are determined by the laws of the place where it was entered upon, but it will be sufficient to observe the law of the place in which the transaction is to come into operation." Hanoverian Statute of 29th October 1822 (G. S. 1822, i. p. 381), § 3: "Parties may also enter upon legal transactions of purely voluntary jurisdiction" (i.e. by the 1st and 2nd sections of this statute, transactions which do not require any previous causæ cognitio, and do not belong to what is called mixed voluntary jurisdiction), "before a foreign court as well as a court of this country, always, of course, provided that they observe the formalities prescribed there." The statute includes, in acts of purely voluntary jurisdiction, all those that depend solely on the free-will of the parties, and to this class, by special enactment, testaments and other instruments mortis causa, are declared to belong.

³⁰ Duguit's view is peculiar. He attempts to show (p. 32) that in regard to the rule "locus regit actum" French law is in sharp opposition to that of Italy; in French law, he says, the rule has simply the force of a personal statute, and is only applicable to the judge or notary who draws up the instrument: and therefore the lex domicilii of the party was always applied, except in cases in which the acts of foreign officials were to be regulated by the lex loci actus, in so far as form was concerned. He adduces, however, no proof for this proposition, which certainly must have a presumption against it. That some authors attempt to put all rules of law under the category either of statuts personnels or réels, does nothing to support his proposition. Nor does the fact, that the application of the rule "locus regit actum," by which the law of the domicile can now and then be evaded, causes much difficulty to the older authors in view of many of the specific directions of the so-called personal statute. The doctrine ascribed by Duguit to the older French jurisprudence is also, he says (p. 22), the rule of the Code Civil, while the recognitions of the rule "locus regit actum," which we find in the code in connection with the important matters of marriage and testaments, are to be looked upon as singular and exceptional cases. As Duguit himself shows, this leads to results that are very dangerous to commerce. According to him, it looks almost as if we must assume, in cases of doubt, that the legislator intended to enact what would be, from a practical point of view, a failure.

judicially, because the courts there do not possess the voluntary jurisdiction, which is necessary to enable them to deal with the case in question? In conformity with this reasoning, we should have to deny validity to all transactions entered into before the foreign officials, who did not possess the special qualifications which native law requires of the officials who are entitled in this country to give validity to the execution of such transactions.

The observation which is also made on this point (Thöl), to the effect that by means of our maxim we are claiming conventional recognition for a very considerable body of legal rules, the application of every one of which to international questions must be separately tested and analysed, is not to the point, seeing that it is this conventional recognition that constitutes the maxim itself. Whenever we have to do with a legal rule, which either expressly or impliedly refuses to be applied in an international sense, then conventional recognition has nothing to do with it, and cannot have. For instance, if by statute certain contracts are only recognised as valid if they are executed before a judge, qualified either in respect of the persons or of the subjects involved to superintend them, validity is denied to any transaction concluded in any other way,³¹ and the like holds if it is prescribed by special enactment that a transaction shall only be valid under certain forms prescribed by native law, and the transaction is concluded abroad under other forms. Legislators have had no difficulty in recognising the rule to the extent we demand in comprehensive enactments pervading entire codes and treaties, and applicable to future as well as to existing laws.³²

LIMITATION TO FORMS WHICH ARE USEFUL MERELY in modum probationis?
LIMITATION TO EXTRINSIC FORMS?

§ 121. According to another view, the rule is to be recognised in so far only as it deals with forms which exist probationis causa.³³ We must, however, reject this limitation also. Of course, if it is provided by statute that a particular transaction can only be entered upon in a particular form, such a transaction in any other form than that so prescribed cannot be received in evidence; but this provision, besides providing means of proof, necessarily protects the parties from hastily concluding their transaction, bound up as it is with circumstantial and striking solemnities. Otherwise we should have to conclude that, if the consent of the parties to the conclusion of any contract were proved by some means other than those provided by the statute even more clearly than the statutory means could ensure, the contract must be recognised as binding. But every statute which prescribes the forms of a legal transaction has some end beyond that of insuring means of proof; the limitation proposed to be put upon the rule will therefore disappear of itself.

³² See Fœlix, i. p. 176, and again, as to the numerous statutory provisions, pp. 186 et seq.

Further, there seems to be no appositeness in distinguishing between the intrinsic and extrinsic form of a legal transaction.³⁴ The form of such a transaction consists in that which the contracting parties must do in order to give expression to their will in the way required by law, and in nothing else: from this definition of form, as that in which the pleasure of the contracting parties must find its expression—a notion which entirely excludes any dependence on the will of any third party—it follows that any essentials of such a transaction, the observance of which is not dependent on the will of the contracting parties, cannot be dealt with as forms.³⁵

When the consent of a third party is required by law, that is to be considered as much part of the matter of the contract as the consent of the original contracting parties. There is an apparent exception in the case where, by law, the consent of a third person cannot be refused, but in such a case that person has no free will, and his consent serves merely to facilitate proof, and to guard the contracting parties from hasty procedure. We have nothing to do, therefore, in this connection with what are often described in French law as "formes habilitantes."

But if, on the other hand, we were to understand, like some authors, the forms of legal transactions or acts to mean all that a legal act requires in order to give it force and validity, then, since all questions of law arise from some legal transaction, the whole system of law would require to be treated of under the title of the form of legal transactions, as, for instance, may be seen in Fœlix's work (p. 162). But it is impossible to apply the rule "locus regit actum" to the forms or solemnities of legal transactions in that wider sense; the course adopted is to limit the forms to which this rule is to apply to that class that serve to prove the will of the parties. But, since every form serves this purpose, this limitation is either unimportant, or, if it is thought to indicate those which do nothing more than serve for proof, misleading. As forms in this sense do not, strictly speaking, exist at all, arbitrary and unjustifiable exceptions to our rule will be made.

For instance, by common law the provisions of the Senatus Consultum

Velleianum are merely provisions to limit the form of undertaking suretyship in the case of a woman, since it needed, in order to make the surety valid, that the woman should previously have been informed as to its meaning by a lawyer, or should ratify it by the form of an oath. But no one can say that these provisions exist merely as means of proof, for by them the female sex is protected against hasty acts. Our opponents, then, go on to pronounce these to be no mere external forms of legal transactions, and hold, therefore, that the rule "locus regit actum" is not applicable.³⁶ But the same thing may be said of all forms—e.g. of the necessity of writing.

LEGAL TRANSACTIONS CONCLUDED IN ANOTHER COUNTRY in fraudem legis.

§ 122. The restriction, too, which many authors adopt, to the effect that a legal transaction, valid by the lex loci contractus, is not to be recognised if it has been entered into in a foreign country in fraudem legis domesticæ—i.e. in order to withdraw it from the operation of some law that prevails in the native country of the parties—is, as Wächter has shown, ii. p. 413, without foundation.³⁷ It is lawful to enter into legal transactions in a foreign country under the forms that are valid there, and it is impossible that any fraud can be found in the case of this legalised privilege. An act is held to be in fraudem legis only if the rule of law is incorrectly expounded, or the state of facts to which it is to be applied is suppressed or misrepresented. Neither can be asserted of the case we have put.³⁸

Still less can anything depend upon whether it was possible for the parties to observe any other law than that which prevailed at the place

³⁶ The decision of the Royal Court of Paris, of 15th March 1831, which is assailed by Fœlix, i. pp. 219, 220, explains itself on this ground, if not on the grounds assigned by the court. The question was as to a surety undertaken by a Spanish woman in France, and it was disputed by the woman on the ground of the provisions of the Roman law still valid in Spain. The court held that, as the real property pledged by the guarantor was situated in France, the capacity of the woman to pledge it must be determined by French law, and generally, that contracts concluded in France, which were sought to be enforced in France, must be interpreted by French law. An appeal was dismissed without a decision on the real question of law, on the ground that the judge had not gone against any law of the land.

³⁷ P. Voet, cap. 2, § 9, No. 9. Weber, Naturl. Verbindlichkeit, § 62. Thibaut, § 38. Mühlénbruch, § 63.

³⁸ Thol, § 65: "On the other hand, one does not evade a rule of law by avoiding the act for which it makes a regulation, and thus excluding the possibility of its application. The same end can often be reached by different ways, the one of which causes more, the other less expense, trouble, delay, and other disadvantages. If we for that reason avoid the one and follow the other, we do not evade the application of a rule of law, but make it impossible to apply it." The question is very well and thoroughly discussed in a judgment of the Appeal Court at Oldenberg, 4th Jan. 1859 (Seuffert, xix. No. 6). It is certainly conceivable that the law, which in other respects regulates the transaction, should only allow it to be entered on in a foreign country in case of necessity. If that be so, then it is in fraudem legis to pretend that such a necessity has arisen. But that is not a thing that will be easily assumed, and an intention to save expense by depriving the fish of this country of dues is not an act in fraudem legis. Laurent, viii. § 213, comes to erroneous conclusions on the subject of acts in fraudem legis: for the correct view, see Wharton, § 695.

where the transaction was entered into: such a limitation is quite arbitrary and unpractical, and is at variance with that which must be recognised as the prevailing theory.³⁹

Laurent (ii. §§ 240 et seq.)⁴⁰ has recently, in criticising Duranton (Code Civ. i. par. 91), laid down a peculiar limitation for the application of the rule "locus regit actum." He proposes that it shall have no application in cases in which an "acte solennel" is in question. That is to say, in all cases where the non-observance of the prescribed solemnities involves a nullity, such solemnity cannot be dispensed with even where the transaction is concluded in a foreign country, although the particular details of this solemn form (e.g. in a marriage ceremony) may be left to the determination of the foreign law. Apart, however, from this last-mentioned piece of illogicality, the whole theory is simply an arbitrary invention of Laurent's. Its sole object is, on the one hand, to get rid of the difficulties in which his mistaken view of the origin of our rule has involved him in regard to the law of real securities, and, on the other, to lay a foundation for his peculiar theories of the treatment of marriage in private international law, according to which the form of marriage before a civil official, first introduced by French legislation, is held to be a kind of primitive law of all mankind, requiring an entirely exceptional treatment. To this last question we shall return later. Let it suffice to say here that Laurent, by his own confession (§§ 243, 244), has almost the whole jurisprudence of France and Belgium against him (see, too, Weiss, p. 523). The benefits of the rule "locus regit actum," for which the whole world is grateful, would by any such limitation be reduced almost to zero, and a general uncertainty in the law would be the only result of Laurent's principles. His theory has been adopted, no doubt, with reference merely to the forms of holograph deeds and deeds executed at the sight of some public authority, or perhaps, to speak more correctly, has been retained in a somewhat modified edition of Laurent's own "avant projet der Code civil belge," art. 20, i.e. the new draft for the revision of the Belgian Code (art. 10), in these terms: "Lorsque la loi qui régit une disposition exige, comme condition substantielle que l'acte ait forme authentique ou la forme olographe, les parties ne peuvent suivre une autre forme, celle ci fût-elle autorisée par la loi du lieu ou l'acte est fait" (Revue, xvi. p. 486). The "motives," or explanatory introduction to the new Belgian draft, afford an extremely weak basis on which to set up this new exception to the old rule, which has done so much service to the intercourse of nations. It is altogether new, for even Belgian jurisprudence had up to this date entirely condemned it, as Haus (par. 84) shows. (See, too, Asser Rivier, § 27 ad fin.) The authors of this explanatory introduction forget that the rule "locus regit actum" is itself a benevolent and wholesome infraction of legal logic. Accordingly, their new discovery that the rule of their 10th article is "juridique," i.e. a piece of legal logic, is of no avail. It is also unavailing to demonstrate that the prescriptions of Belgian law as to testaments, donations, etc., will in this way be better maintained. For any one can understand that the law of a State will be all the better maintained in any given subject, the more blindly and indiscriminately it is applied. The only question is whether the interests of Belgian subjects, and with them those of the Belgian State, will not suffer all the more in other ways.

If Laurent's rule were generally adopted, it would involve a calamity for international intercourse and commerce.

But it is possible that the territorial law, which rules the legal transaction in itself, may either expressly or by implication forbid the use of forms, which are held sufficient in foreign countries, either entirely or to a certain extent. Thus the Prussian Senate in 1875⁴¹ decided that a verbal testament made by a Russian in Austria was invalid, because the Prussian statute book, while recognising, generally speaking, the rule "locus regit actum," nevertheless requires all testaments to be recorded, a requirement which of course could not be satisfied in the case of an oral testament. In the same way, by an express enactment of the 992nd article of the Code of the Netherlands, a testament executed abroad by a subject of that State, in a form which is not sanctioned by some public authority (authentique), must be held invalid.⁴²

IS THE RULE PERMISSIVE OR COMPULSORY ?

§ 123. If we understand our rule to have its origin in usage, which is rested on reasons of convenience for the promotion of commerce, it must be regarded as a facility afforded to the contracting parties, and not as a compulsory form. These parties, therefore, have it in their power either to observe the form which is recognised in the country where the transaction takes place, or that which is provided by the laws to which the transaction is subject. The rule "locus regit actum" imports a mere faculty, it does not involve any compulsion or restriction upon the parties. This view has an overwhelming majority of text writers and of legal precedents on its side.⁴³

⁴¹ See Sérébrianny in Jour. xi. p. 363.

In this connection it is well to remember that, in the case of mutual contracts, there would actually need to be a consideration of the laws of the domiciles of both parties if the lex loci contractus were not to rule. This we have hitherto assumed as self-evident, and later, in the subject of the law of obligations, we shall recur to it. If these laws in a case of the kind were different, and both parties had not observed the forms required by both, then the contract, unless it is voluntarily fulfilled, is simply null, unless the provisions of the law of the place of execution are to be respected. No preference can be given to either system of law, since all arguments are as much in favour of the one as of the other.⁴⁴ Mutual contracts, therefore, if they are not in conformity with the forms of the lex loci contractus, can only be recognised as valid if they are in conformity with the forms which are recognised at the domicile of both of the contracting parties.⁴⁵ In cases in which there are several joint obligants or subsidiary obligants involved, the question we are now discussing is open to the same considerations for every one of them. It is possible—and this is a necessary result of the nature of joint or subsidiary liability in general—that a joint or subsidiary obligant should avail himself of the invalidity in the obligation of some of the other obligants, e.g. the principal debtor.

It must at the same time be remarked that the observance of the forms prescribed for any contract constitutes the best proof of the expression of the will of the parties to enter upon it. If, therefore, the forms prescribed by the law of the place of the contract are not followed, it will often be doubtful whether the negotiations of parties are or are not to be considered as mere preliminaries. The will of the parties to undertake the contract must in that case be demonstrated by some other special proof. Even if the forms which are required by the native laws of both contracting parties happen to be observed, this doubt must still be removed; and as a general rule it cannot be dispelled if the native laws of the contracting parties prescribe no particular form for the transaction in May 1862 and 23rd April 1863, (Seuffert, xviii. No. 204); at Rostock, 1854 and 1866 (Buchka and Budde (Dec. iv. p. 67 and vi. p. 48); German Imperial Court (i.) 27th April 1881 (Seuffert, xxxvii. No. 1); 18th Feb. 1880 (Dec. i. p. 328). The judgments of the German Imperial Court are most distinctly expressed upon this point. To the same effect Codice Civ. Ital. disposiz. prelim. art. 9, and the provisions of the Swiss codes (Huber, Schweizer. Privatr. i. pp. 95, 96). Dudley Field, art. 614, is of another opinion, but gives no reason for it; so, too, Renaud, Rechtliche Gutachten (1886), i. p. 456. Laurent, § 245 (who proceeds logically enough after he has settled his premisses); Stefano Napolitani, p. 24 (who uses this peculiar argument, that the foreigner is admitted to the enjoyment of civil rights); Asser Rivier is doubtful, but certainly inclines to be of Laurent's opinion; Bohlau's discussions are unintelligible (p. 437). See, also, in the sense of the text, the civil statute book for Saxony, § 9, and the Hannoverian statute of 29th Oct. 1822, §§ 1-3 supra, § 120, note 30. Roth, § 51, note 126 et seq.

⁴⁵ To the same effect the detailed exposition given by Fiore, § 321.

question. The validity of a contract concluded according to the domestic law of both of the parties will then, as a general rule,⁴⁶ only fall to be affirmed in cases in which subjects of the same State make a contract in a foreign country, or some one in a foreign country executes a unilateral deed, such as a testament. But in the former case a transaction in a form which is valid by the laws of the parties' native country cannot, as a matter of course, be treated as binding. There is, as a general rule, a want of proof of the will to enter upon a binding engagement if the parties do not know each other to be fellow-countrymen, or if the transaction is one which has no reference to the domicile of the contracting parties, or has no connection with the personal intimacy of the parties (e.g. if the contract, according to the meaning of parties, is to be carried out on the spot, or if it is concluded on the exchange or in the market, and falls under the laws that prevail there, in which case parties may very well suppose that, for the sake of commerce, one common law should bind all who resort to it).

It is different if the contract is really meant to be carried out in another country; or if there is some consideration of personal intimacy to be taken into account, as is the case in the contract of marriage, to be dealt with hereafter.

The determination of this question depends therefore upon an accurate estimate⁴⁷ of the particular circumstances, which is often a matter of great difficulty. These difficulties have given many text writers a lever for maintaining that no legal transactions should be recognised unless they are in the form sanctioned by the law of the place in which they are executed. This lever will not, however, bear to be put to the test. If there be really a serious doubt of the sincerity of the intentions of the parties to bind themselves, which is incapable of solution, then, even according to our theory, the transaction must be regarded as not proven, and therefore non-existent. So far, therefore, there is no practical difference between our theory and its opponent. But why should we be forced to regard a legal transaction as non-existent in other cases, where there is no doubt about the intention of parties? Such cases, for instance, as those in which the place of the conclusion of the contract—one concluded, it may be, in the course of a journey—cannot be certainly ascertained, or where the place of conclusion is in an uncivilised country: in both such classes of cases the rule "locus regit actum" is necessarily inapplicable.⁴⁸

In the case of unilateral acts these doubts do not occur so frequently, and are to be treated as settled if the particular forms prescribed by the native laws of the party executing them are observed. The will to execute a valid act is in this case proved by the observance of the forms. Since the laws of nearly every country prescribe particular forms for last wills, it is most natural that instances of the application of the personal laws should be presented in this connection; and it is this question which is chiefly dealt with by authors on the subject, while they do not concern themselves with what is, as a matter of fact, not a very frequent occurrence—viz. the neglect of the lex loci actus in the case of bilateral contracts. We have no right, therefore, to hold those persons who apparently take no heed of anything but the lex loci contractus to be opponents of our theory, unless they expressly reject the validity of the lex domicilii in every case such as we are now dealing with. We may, indeed, safely assume that they agree with our theory, if they propose to recognise the validity of a testament executed in a foreign country in cases in which it is in conformity with no other law than that of the domicile of the testator.⁴⁹

⁴⁶ It is, however, too much of a limitation that is provided by art. 9, subsec. 1 of the dispos. prelim. of the Codice Civ. Ital. in perfectly general terms, viz.: "E pero in facoltà dei disponenti o contraenti di seguire le forme della loro legge nazionale, purchè questa sia comune a tutte le parti." Esperson, Jour. ix. p. 159. The nationality of the other contracting party cannot always be ascertained with certainty; on the other hand, the native laws of both parties may be the same or similar.

⁴⁷ In agreement with this view, Wharton, § 680.

But just as we require special proof of the intention of parties to enter upon a legal act according to the laws that prevail in their domicile, that intention may be left doubtful even in cases where the form is according to the lex loci actus, especially in cases of unilateral acts, if it should happen that such acts require fewer forms, according to the rules of law in force on the spot where they are executed, than they do according to the laws of the domicile of the person who executes them;⁵⁰ and the same doubt ⁴⁹ Hert, iv. 23, 25; Rodenburg, ii. c. 3, §§ 1, 2; Hofeker, De Effic. § 28; Seger, p. 24; Ziegler, Concl. 15, § 16; Witzendorff, xxvii. No. 7; Dionysius Gothofredus, Ad Leg. 20, D. de Juris Dict. 2, 1; Bouhier, cap. 28, No. 20; Vattel, ii. c. viii. § 111; Mittermaier, D. Privatr. § 32, p. 121; Gand, No. 579; Burge, iv. p. 588. Boullenois is quite illogical (i. p. 422, and ii. p. 15) in allowing the lex loci actus alone to rule, while he still gives inhabitants of provinces, where holograph wills are recognised, the privilege of availing themselves of this simple form in a foreign country. Cf. this reasoning, in which the form of a holograph will is treated as a personal privilege, with the judgment of the Appeal Court at Paris, reported by Sirey, v. 1, p. 357. Some of the authorities quoted above limit the validity of a testament which has been executed according to the laws of the testator's domicile, but is not in conformity with the form of the lex loci actus, to the property which is situated at that domicile; but under the rule, "Mobilia ossibus inhaerent," they include in this all moveable property. It is only by a very few authors that we find it expressly remarked—a remark for which they give no justification—that a testament, valid according to the laws of the testator's domicile in its form, is null if it does not in form answer to the requirements of the laws of the place where it is executed (Riccius, p. 533; Holzschuher, i. p. 81. Cf. also the citations given by Fœlix, i. pp. 162-164). The kernel of this theory lies in the erroneous assumption that the law desires to apply its authority to all and every act that takes place in its territory—a notion we have already combated. Cf., too, the judgment of the Court of Appeal at Paris, of 9th March 1853, reported by Demangeat in his note to Fœlix, i. p. 184.

⁵⁰ Cf. Mittermaier's note, § 31.

In this sense we must, in judging of the form of a legal transaction, make reference to the intention of the contracting parties—not, however, meaning thereby that we should test in this way the validity of the form, but merely estimate its import upon the binding force of the act. Perhaps it is from this fact, which is undoubtedly entitled to much respect, that the theory by which the rule "locus regit actum" is founded upon a voluntary submission to foreign law (autonomy) has sprung.

may arise in the case of bilateral contracts, if, for instance, the contract is made while the parties are travelling by rail or mail-coach.⁵¹ In the latter case, there may even be some doubt as to where the contract was concluded. Then there is nothing at all to show, if different laws prevail at the different stages of the journey, which of them is to prevail as the lex loci contractus, and if we were to adopt the theory which makes the lex loci contractus the sole rule as to the form of every legal act, we should have no principle of determination to guide us. But, according to the view we have maintained, the act is valid if in its form it accords with the laws of the domiciles of both contracting parties.⁵²

LEGAL TRANSACTIONS, CONCLUDED BEFORE AMBASSADORS AND CONSULS.

§ 124. Nothing but the fact that the rule "locus regit actum" is a permissive rule, will explain a regulation which is recognised as existing in practice by the most modern codes and treaties, and which has attained a

⁵² Acts of public officers, however, are only valid if the forms prescribed for the place of their execution are respected. This case does not fall under the rule "locus regit actum." The Government can only give a public authentication to the acts of its officers on condition that all prescribed forms are respected. The neglect of these forms leads to the result that the defective acts are not recognised as of official weight, and they cannot acquire a public authentication from the accidental circumstance that in another country these forms are not necessary. If, for instance, the laws of the place where any deed was executed required the register to be subscribed by the parties on pain of nullity, or the official to add the official seal to his signature, then if either of these requisites were wanting, it would follow that the deed was void, not only in that country, but could not enjoy public recognition anywhere (cf. Story, § 260, and especially the Prussian-Lippian Treaty of 18th March 1857, art. 32: "If by the constitution of either State, the validity of an act depends upon its being undertaken before a particular officer, that is hereby continued"). It is, however, quite consistent with this, that the public officers of a State should, along with the forms therein required to give publica fides to any act, observe those forms also, in the case of an act which naturally belongs to another State, which give validity to such an act by the laws of that foreign State, in so far as these foreign laws do not recognise the rule "locus regit actum." Hannov. Regulations of 28th Dec. 1821, § 2. "If documents are to be drawn up for foreign transactions, in which, according to the forms of foreign law, a sworn attestation before a notary and witnesses is required, this may be done on the spot." (This regulation forbids generally all oaths before a notary and witnesses.)

very considerable importance.⁵³ It is becoming more and more common to invest ambassadors and consuls with power to superintend the execution of deeds which deal with legal transactions between citizens of the State which they represent, and also, as officials charged with the care of questions of status, to conduct marriages between such persons, in the form, of course, which is prescribed by the law of their State. The explanation of the validity and universal recognition of this kind of procedure is not to be found in any fiction that the acts of the ambassador or consul are to be regarded as having taken place within the territory of the State which the functionary represents. Any such assumption would be unsound. All are now agreed that even the ambassador's residence cannot be said in such matters to be exempt from the operation of the authority of the State in which it is situated, or be regarded as a part of the native territory of the ambassador. Still less can there be any such assumption made with regard to the acts of a consul, who need not enjoy in any respect the privileges of extra-territoriality. But just as the State, to the laws and jurisdiction of which a legal transaction is subject, may enact that it may be concluded or executed without any particular form, it has also the power of enacting that the legal steps taken by its subjects, in presence of its consuls or ambassadors, shall be held to be well taken.⁵⁴ This does not involve any invasion of the sovereignty of any other State, and accordingly, if we go strictly to work, the consent of the State within whose territory the act is done is not necessary. On the contrary, this voluntary jurisdiction, to the limited extent which we have described, can only be exercised with the permission of the law⁵⁵ of the State which the ambassador or consul represents. The recognition of the privilege in international treaties imports nothing more than a ratification by the other State.⁵⁶ Any further extension of the voluntary jurisdiction of ambassadors or consuls could make no claim to general recognition unless it proceeded upon the authority of a treaty.

⁵⁶ Cf. Renault (Jour. viii. p. 85), and the judgment of the Tribunal of Antwerp of 4th August 1877, to the same effect. See, too, the German-Servian treaty (cited above), § 9, subsec. 4: "Consuls are entitled to receive and authenticate legal documents, or certify legal proceedings, in which none but inhabitants of the State in which they have their official residence, or subjects of third States are concerned, in conformity with the law of the State by which they have been nominated, if these documents or proceedings have to do with moveables which are situated in that State, or with immoveable property, or with affairs which are intended to be carried on there."

In the Levant, and in those States in which the subjects of European Christian Powers enjoy extra-territoriality, it seems that, in so far as these persons are concerned, the rule "locus regit actum" has no application. Their obligations will be in the form sanctioned by the native law of the obligant.⁵⁷

LEGAL TRANSACTIONS BETWEEN PERSONS WHO DO NOT MEET, (CONCLUDED BY MEANS OF LETTERS AND TELEGRAMS).

§ 125. The question as to what law is to determine the form of a contract concluded by letter, between persons who do not meet, can only be answered on the assumption that the rule "locus regit actum" has simply the force of a permission, and is not imperative. It might be fancied that the only point for consideration is, at what place the contract is to be held to have been concluded, whether at the domicile of the offerer or at that of the acceptor, and, as a matter of fact, well-known authorities take pains to show that the one or the other of these two places must be recognised as regulating these matters.⁵⁸ But positive law and the practice of different nations cannot be held to such a priori deductions. The law of one State may enact that the transaction is to be regarded as having come into existence in State A, the domicile of the offerer, while the law of another enacts that the domicile of the acceptor is to be held to be the place. How could any decision be reached, if it were absolutely necessary to determine which is truly the place of the execution of the contract?

At the same time, we must notice, in accordance with what has gone before, that the intention of the correspondents to enter on a binding contract, remains doubtful if the form of the contract is faulty. The contract is therefore only good if it is in conformity with the laws that prevail at the domicile of both of the parties.⁵⁹ If, however, the person who receives a letter deals merely as a mandatary, and concludes a bargain in this character, which binds him according to the law of his domicile, but does not bind the mandant according to the law of his domicile, he may have a claim for recompense against the mandatary, founded on the mandate, although the bargain itself will not bind the mandatary; provided always that the mandatary has bona fide regarded the mandant's offer as legally binding, and that the mandate did not require any special form according to the law of the mandant's domicile.

Further, it is obvious that in a bargain which implies merely an unilateral obligation, e.g. in a donation, only the form prescribed by the law of the obligant need be observed. The object of the existence of these forms is merely to protect the obligant from rashness, and from dishonest claims being made upon him: they have no application to the person who desires to acquire a right. A donation, therefore, may be constituted as between persons who never meet without any special form, if the personal law of the donor does not require any special form.⁶⁰

FORMS PRESCRIBED IN THE INTEREST OF THE FISK.

§ 126. If, moreover, a transaction is invalid, because the forms prescribed by the law of the place where it is negotiated have not been observed, it can make no difference in the result that these forms are required, not in the interest of the parties, but in that of the fisk,⁶¹ or public revenue. Accordingly, if neglect of the stamp laws, which are in force at the place in which the transaction is concluded, draws with it the penalty of nullity, the same effect must be attributed to that neglect in a foreign country also, and it is no good objection⁶² that the fiscal or revenue laws of foreign States have no force for us. The question in such cases is not one of the exaction of foreign stamp duties; it is one as to the form of the legal transaction. We might quite as justly ignore a provision of a foreign law, which required certain transactions to be concluded before a court as an essential form, if this form was required for no other end, save to secure to the State a revenue out of the dues exacted on such occasions.

⁶⁰ See the judgment cited in the last note.

⁶¹ One cannot see why a transaction which is void from the beginning—if the law of the place of execution is to be allowed to have any voice at all in regulating its form—should acquire validity by being pleaded in the courts of another country. (See the words of the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas (Eyre), in Melan v. Fitzjames, 1797, 1, Bos. and Pull, 138, in Burge, iii. p. 767. See also Foote, p. 285.)

But if there has been any ratification, although merely by implication, in a foreign country—and an omission to advance the plea of nullity in a lawsuit falls under this head—this operates to validate the transaction from the beginning, so that an invalidity of this kind can never be liable to be noticed ex parte judicis.

EFFECT OF A CHANGE IN THE PERSONAL LAW, IF THE TRANSACTION HAS NOT BEEN CONCLUDED ACCORDING TO THE FORMS OF THE lex loci actus.

§ 127. There is still another question to be discussed. Is it possible that a legal transaction, which is not fully in accordance with the legal forms observed at the place where it has been concluded, but is in conformity with the personal law of the party, should become null through some change taking place in the personal law of that party?

This question is identical with the other, viz. whether we are to test the transaction itself by the personal law at the time of execution, or that which the party last had; for the form prescribed by the personal law can only be applied in cases in which the transaction itself is, speaking generally, subject to the law of the party's home or domicile.

Accordingly, obligatory contracts do not become ineffectual by an alteration in the nationality or domicile of one of the contracting parties. This does, however, take place in the case of testaments, e.g. if a person in whose domicile holograph wills are effectual executes one in a foreign country, where testaments must be concluded in judicial form, and then acquires a domicile or nationality in a country where holograph wills are unknown.⁶³

The point seems to be doubtful in the case of contracts as to succession. Such contracts settle the right of succession, and, if that must necessarily be determined by the last personal law of the deceased, it seems to follow that these contracts must be determined likewise by that law; and that in this way, if they are not executed according to the forms of the place of execution, they may, for want of formalities,⁶⁴ lose all validity⁶⁵ owing to a ⁶³ So, too, Wächter, ii, p. 380, as to testaments. Wächter's conception of the ratio of the matter is not sufficiently sharply defined. He says that, in respect the deceased's domicile is the sole ground on which the application of this or that law can depend, as the domicile alters so must the law which is to be applied, for, as the grounds alter, so must the results that are based upon them. But this would lead us to the conclusion that even obligatory contracts may become invalid in form if a change takes place in the domicile of one of the parties.

change of the nationality or domicile of one of the stipulating parties. But then these contracts give rise at once to de praesenti rights in the parties; whereas a testament has no effect at all till the death of the testator, a contract as to succession sets a limit on his power of disposal at once. This limitation of the jus disponendi, for the benefit of the heirs who are to take under the contract, has already an effect de praesenti, and is therefore subject to the law of the domicile which the contracting testator has at the date of his contract, and its operation cannot be defeated by the law of the place of his domicile at death, unless upon conditions which forbid the performance of existing contracts: it cannot be assailed by means of the enactments which are directed to the regulation of the execution or inception of legal transactions, among which regulations we must undoubtedly reckon directions as to form. Any other view would give the parties to a contract of succession power to alter their contract as they pleased by changing their personal law, and would thus give full play to infringements of honesty and confidence.⁶⁶

It is thus only such legal transactions as have no present operation, and admit of alterations at the will of one person, that can be rendered inoperative by a change in the domicile of a party. Bilateral contracts cannot.

It is obvious that bilateral contracts which have been executed in such a form as to be invalid, can never, by a subsequent change in the domicile of one of the parties, become valid. In the case of unilateral contracts, it may be possible to conceive that the expression of intention which has once been made may be presumed to continue to subsist.⁶⁷ But the same reasons may be urged against this presumption as are used against the application of new laws, by which the forms of unilateral legal transactions are simplified and facilitated, to such transactions as were invalidly executed in the days of the older law. Neglected forms may, as Savigny⁶⁸ says of the rule tempus regit actum, proceed simply from ignorance of law, while there may all the time be a serious intention of entering on the transaction. But it may just as well be that the forms are neglected in full knowledge of the rule of law which applies to them, so that the document was only intended to serve as a preliminary for a deed which should be really effectual. In taking up such questions, we should simply entangle ourselves in an attempt to judge of accidental circumstances depending on bare possibilities.

⁶⁶ We have assumed, in the foregoing discussion, that the law of succession, as is the case according to the principles of the common law recognised in Germany, is ruled by the last personal law of the deceased. If, as is the case in the law of England [and Scotland], the lex rei sitæ rules in the case of real property, then, in so far as real property is concerned, contracts as to succession and testaments cannot be validly executed, except in the forms of the lex rei sitæ. See below, on the law of succession.

⁶⁸ Savigny, § 386; Guthrie, pp. 355-357.

WOULD IT BE PRACTICAL TO GIVE THE RULE "locus regit actum" COMPULSORY EFFECT IN THE FUTURE?

§ 128. We have shown that the rule "locus regit actum" has, in the present condition of the law, merely a permissive force. The question may, however, be put whether it would not be desirable, by means of statutes and treaties, to give the rule a compulsory application in the future,⁶⁹ so that any legal transaction which does not comply with the forms of the place where it was executed should be regarded as invalid all the world over. As a matter of fact, this new idea is not totally destitute of supporters, especially in connection with the theory of French jurisprudence, which seeks to connect itself with the old statute theory, and on that account desires either to have a category of statutes devoted to form, or to attempt to reckon the rules of law that concern the forms of legal transactions either among the Statuts réels or the Statuts personnels. This position is represented most thoroughly and in its best light by Duguit, at the close of his work on the forms of legal transactions. His leading arguments are these prepositions, viz.: 1st, That one isolated system of law, e.g. that of the domicile of the parties interested, may no doubt hold that the legal transaction is valid, if it conforms to its own rules, and not to those of the place where it was executed, but that in other quarters this very transaction may be regarded as invalid: this would be productive of grave disadvantages for the security of legal intercourse; 2nd, That the proof of a legal transaction must take place according to the rule of the law that prevails at the place where it was entered upon, and must be regulated by that law; and again, that the same law must regulate the proof and the form of one legal transaction; 3rd, That on general legal principle it is inadmissible to allow parties their choice between different forms for a legal transaction, or still more between a particular form and no form at all.

For the first of these propositions no proof at all is adduced. If the State to which the legal relation that is affected or originated by the transaction in question belongs, recognises that transaction as fully operative and valid, why should or must other States do anything else? What matters it to England, if, for instance, two subjects of the German Empire make a bargain in Russia about a thing which is situated in the German Empire, in which empire the bargain is to be carried out, and in concluding their bargain have observed their own native law and not that of Russia?

⁶⁹ It is sad to have to notice that the Institute of International Law in 1887 pronounced in favour of the rule being compulsory as regards marriage ceremonies. On this resolution, see our remarks under the head of marriage.

And what interest could the Russian State itself have in treating the bargain as invalid? At the most, it might have such an interest, if the parties, in order to avoid some Russian impost, e.g. a stamp duty, had chosen their own domestic law, or, as their own law allows them to do, had made their contract without any particular form on that account. But in truth nothing of the kind takes place, and Duguit's proposition is simply a petitio principii, and at the same time is the reverse of the rule, the soundness of which we have already tested, and on the distinct recognition of which all advance in modern private international law depends—the rule, namely, that every legal relation must be ruled by the law of that territory, the law of which should, in accordance with the nature of the thing, operate upon it.

His second proposition rests upon a principle which is beyond all doubt an error. It is not merely in the shape in which proof is to be taken that we say that proof is dependent on the lex fori: it is also in substance dependent on it. There may at times be a doubt whether a rule of law concerns the form or the proof of a legal act, and that is especially the case with certain rules of the law of France, which limit proof by witnesses. But a claim can never be made successfully to turn upside down private international law, which is intended to give rules for the whole civilised world, to meet these rules of law belonging to one single country, which are, besides, very questionable in themselves. We shall see later, that it is possible to do justice even to such vague rules of law, which are by no means deserving of being sanctioned by legislation, without having recourse to an unsound principle.

The third proposition rests ultimately upon a confusion of thought. Parties cannot neglect the forms of a legal transaction, if these are imposed upon them as compulsory regulations. But we do not understand why a system of law should not leave parties a choice between different forms; we find, for example, in very many highly important systems exactly the opposite maxim in regard to the forms of testaments. It is difficult to conceive how it should be a misfortune that the parties should, in certain cases, have the power of electing between the forms of this or that law: as well might it be thought a misfortune that this resuscitated statute theory apparently suffers some prejudice from that power of electing.

But not only are there no reasons upon which an argument for the compulsory force of the rule "locus regit actum" can be based, but, on the contrary, there are very distinct reasons against it. In the first place, it is never advisable to break through the rules of legal logic unnecessarily. These rules, however, lead us to recognise all legal transactions as valid in point of form, if they satisfy, in point of form, the law to which they are in substance subject. We must add to this, that if the rule had a compulsory force the parties would not unfrequently be forced, without any real advantage, to subject themselves, e.g. in case of marriage, to the forms and formalities of another country which might be costly, roundabout, and it might frequently be offensive to their feelings. In States in which the officials are not entirely trustworthy, such a rule of subjection to their authority might be a very serious matter; imagine, under such circumstances, a case in which the law of the domicile permits holograph or so-called mystic⁷⁰ testaments, while the State in which the person has his residence does not. Or shall we make out a list of the States in which, in respect of the trustworthiness of the officials, etc., we could give a compulsory force to the rule "locus regit actum"? Of course, uncivilised States would be excepted, but what is the limit, according to which the judge is to determine the different cases that arise? To execute legal transactions before a consul or an ambassador of one's native State is not always convenient, or is often too roundabout and expensive. It is simpler to allow the public, whose protection is the object of investing our rule with compulsory force, the opportunity of having recourse, as they require, to their native law. And what would be the result of such a rule, if we could not ascertain with certainty what was the place of the legal transaction?

It is true that in particular cases the legal transaction, which is executed in the form of the lex loci actus, is better protected against the risk of subsequently being rendered inoperative, than that which is in accordance with the forms of the native State, particularly in the case of a testament. It is also quite true, that persons ignorant of law can in many cases get information more easily as to the law of the place in which they are staying, than as to the law of their native State. But we should leave the determination of these endlessly various points to the parties themselves, who are concerned in the matter, as the ruling theory has for long done; and all the more shall we do so, as in many cases it is not so very simple to decide, whether some particular enactment concerns the form or the substance of the transaction. But, in such doubtful cases, and at anyrate when the domestic law of one of the parties is decisive of the case, it is advisable to adhere to the domestic law.

Against all these disadvantages it is of little importance that, if our rule has merely a permissive force, it may in isolated cases—if the lex loci actus requires a particular form, while the domestic law of the parties recognises the transaction as valid, without any particular form—be doubtful, if the lex loci actus has not been observed, whether a party intended to make a binding declaration, or to come under a binding obligation, as the case may be. This point we have noticed already.

NOTE E. ON §§ 117-128 ON THE RULE "LOCUS REGIT ACTUM."

[The rule "locus regit actum" is received in Scotland, France, and America, but in England is subjected to serious limitations. In France the doctrine is laid down in a case of Benton v. Horeau, 26th August 1880, by the Court of Cassation (Jour. vii. p. 480). A contract had been concluded verbally in England between a Frenchman and an Englishman; the Englishman came to sue on the contract in France; it was objected that it was incompetent to prove the debt arising on the contract otherwise than by writing, because the amount of it exceeded 150 francs. To this it was answered, that by the law of England, where the contract was made, writing was not necessary to constitute the obligation, and the rule to be applied was "locus regit actum," this being a question as to the validity of the vinculum obligationis. Parole proof was allowed, on the ground that the form of the contract and the proof of the execution must be governed by the law of the place of the execution. The intention of the parties was to bind themselves by the law of the place where they were at the time, and the question they put to themselves was, "Do we need to bind ourselves in writing or not?"

⁷⁰ [A mystic testament is one signed by the testator, and handed by him, under a sealed cover, to a notary in presence of six witnesses.]

In Scotland, a contract executed in conformity with foreign forms is recognised as valid and enforced by the courts, although it does not comply with Scots forms. In the application of this rule the following liberal extension is made: "This," says Erskine, Instit. iii. 2-39, "holds even in such obligations as bind the granter to convey subjects" (i.e. heritage or real property) "within Scotland; for where one becomes bound by a lawful obligation, he cannot cease to be bound by changing places." All personal obligations or contracts "are deemed as effectual, when they come to receive execution in Scotland, as if they had been perfected in the Scottish form." The rule is, of course, limited to forms; "for," says the same author, "it would be absurd to give the smallest effect to a foreign deed perfected according to the law of the place where it was made out which would not be effectual here, though it had been perfected with all the solemnities required by our law." This statement of the law has received judicial sanction in many cases (e.g. in Purvis' Trustees v. Purvis' Executors, 23rd March 1861, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xxiii. p. 831, per Inglis, L.J.C.). "All instruments (without distinction, except in the conveyance of land) executed abroad according to the solemnities of the place of execution, must receive effect in Scotland exactly in the same way as if they were executed within Scotland according to the solemnities of the Act 1681." This rule has been extended, as in France, in the case quoted above, so as to allow a contract concluded in England, where it might be concluded verbally, to be proved in Scotland to have been so constituted, although writing would have been required to constitute it in Scotland (Dale v. Dumbarton Glass Company, 1829, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 1st ser. vii. p. 369). The mode of proof, however, must in Scottish courts be regulated by their own law, i.e. in certain cases by writ or oath, although the question to be so settled may be, "Was the obligation verbally constituted?" that being a mode of constitution allowed in the particular circumstances by foreign law, and therefore admitted in Scotland. Whereas, however, the author holds that the application of the rule "locus regit actum" is permissive merely and not imperative, the law of Scotland requires the observance of the law of the place of execution, i.e. makes the rule imperative, unless where the lex loci solutionis is adopted. A contract, then, which does not satisfy the requirements of the law of the place of execution, will not be received by the court of another country, even although it satisfies the forms of the country in which the court is situated; this inference has been adopted in Scotland (Taylor v. Scott, 16th July 1847, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. ix. p. 1504). The court will, however, recognise a contract, and give effect to it, if the formalities of the law of the place of performance are, instead of those of the place of execution, observed in drawing up the contract. The opinion of Lord President Inglis, in Valery v. Scott, 4th July 1876, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. iii. p. 965, that the observance of either the law of the place of execution or of performance will make a deed effectual, was pronounced in a case where the contract was intended to be carried out in Scotland although executed in France; but, according to his lordship's reasoning, it was immaterial that the forum and the locus solutionis coincided. The place of performance was to be held to be the "place of the contract," and observance of its forms would be sufficient. The court would recognise and enforce, so far as they could, a contract in the forms of the locus solutionis, even although that was a different country from the country to which the court belonged.

The general rule is stated by Prof. Bell, in his "Lectures on Conveyancing," p. 88, chap. iii.: "The privileges allowed to such deeds" (i.e. deeds executed by foreigners according to the law of their domicile) "are extended to writings of the same class, even when the granter is a Scotchman, provided the deeds are actually executed out of Scotland, and according to the laws of the place of execution. But it is essential, as to all such deeds, that as a matter of fact they are validly executed according to the laws of the country where they are entered into." The professor, however, as is clear from his statement on p. 90, does not mean to suggest that domiciled Scotsmen, meeting abroad, and concluding a contract which is to be carried out in Scotland, are bound to observe the law of the foreign country, on the contrary, he recommends them to follow the forms of the law of Scotland. His doctrine, therefore, is not at variance with that of the Lord President in Valery v. Scott.

Story states the law to a similar effect, § 260 (4): "All formalities, proofs, or authentications of" contracts, "which are required by the lex loci, are indispensable to their validity everywhere else." He expresses, however, a doubt as to whether the law of the place of execution, or of the forum, will regulate the admissibility of proof of the contract when it comes to be enforced. Probably the distinction on this point taken in Scotland supplies the correct solution.

It will of course be understood that the condition that such contracts, or the solemnities required in their execution, shall not be inconsistent with our rules of morality or of police, is required by the laws of these countries and by that of England: and in the case of a conveyance of real estate, the lex rei sitæ must be observed.

The rule in England is not quite so liberally applied; it is no doubt the case that the rule is recognised, and not merely recognised, but regarded as imperative. "A contract must be available by the law of the place where it is entered into, or it is void all the world over" (per Lord Ellenborough, in Clegg v. Levy, 1812, 3 Camp. 167); and Addison states, p. 195, bk. i. cap. 2, "The lex loci contractus generally prevails in all that relates to the legal validity of the contract, the vinculum obligationis. . . . If the contract is valid by the law of the country where it is made, it is valid everywhere, unless it is contra bonos mores, or is a contract for the doing of a thing which is directly prohibited and forbidden in, or contrary to, the public policy of the country where the contract is sought to be enforced."

But the law of England goes further. It seems to hold (Addison, p. 198) that a contract to be enforced in England must be valid as regards form, both by the law of England and by the law of the country in which it is entered into. Westlake, too (§ 208), sums up the English law thus: "A contract, although externally perfect according to the law of the place where it was made, cannot be enforced in England unless evidenced in such manner as English law requires." This doctrine is in direct conflict with the systems of law already referred to, and with the doctrine of the text; it seems indeed to be contradictory of the maxim "locus regit actum," as Westlake points out. If the intention be to reserve the decision on all matters of procedure "litis ordinatoria" for the lex fori, as is indicated from the cases quoted by Addison, that principle is perfectly sound; but the recognition of it need not involve the rejection of a contract as available in England, because it is constituted by other means than those admitted there. The distinction taken in Scotland between the constitution of the obligation and the ascertainment of the fact whether it has been so constituted or not, seems to be the true rule.

A prohibitory law allowing no scope to the will of parties will, as stated in the text, demand observance and exclude the rule "locus regit actum."

The application of the rule to particular legal relations—e.g. marriage, divorce, bills, etc., and particularly to testaments—will receive further consideration infra.

As regards the execution of contracts by means of letters, Addison states the law of England thus (p. 197): "When contracts are entered into between parties residing in different countries, through the medium of letters, the place where the final assent has been given by one party to an offer made by another, is the place where the contract is considered to have been made." And it is by that law that the contract is to be determined.

In Belgium, on the other hand, the contract is not held to be concluded till the acceptance of the offer has reached the offerer, and therefore the place of the conclusion of the contract is, as a rule, held to be the domicile of the offerer. (Velghe v. Van Oye, 1876, Jour. ix. p. 564.)

The law of England and America, as to the necessity of stamping foreign contracts, seems to coincide with that of the author. Addison on Contracts, p. 1060, states the law of England to be, that although foreign documents are not excluded from being received as evidence in English courts, because they are unstamped, and therefore could not be received in their own country, yet if they are void by their own law, they cannot be enforced in England. By "their own country" I understand him to mean the country in which they are executed (see also Bristow v. Sequeville, 1850, L. R. 5 Ex. 275). Story, § 260 (4), says: "Thus, if by the laws of a country a contract belonging to that country is void, unless it is written on stamped paper, it ought to be held void everywhere; for unless it be good there, it can have no obligation in any other country." This doctrine is approved by Westlake, p. 251.

In Scotland the law, until recently, was that the court would not take any notice of foreign revenue laws (Bell's Pr. § 328; Menzies, p. 88; Stewart v. Gelot, 1871, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 3rd ser. ix.1057); but this has been doubted (cf. Lord Deas in Valery v. Scott, 1876, ibid. 4th ser. iii. p. 965). The reasoning of the text would probably now induce the Scottish courts to follow the doctrine of England and the other countries already mentioned, for it is difficult to justify the old practice of giving effect to a contract which the parties must have known to be null.

Fourth Book.

THE LAW OF PERSONS.

(STATUS AND CAPACITY.)

I. THE NATURAL EXISTENCE (Dasein) OF PERSONALITY.

CAPACITY OF LIVING.

§ 129. The question, under what law the beginning of a person's physical existence falls, has very seldom been considered by courts of law, because, as a rule, the question is merely one of fact. And yet here, too, we may imagine cases admitting of dispute—as, for instance, when one law does not hold a child to be living unless it is also viable; while another is contented if the child shall have shown a sign of life for a single moment. The object of positive provisions of this kind—as to the precise point at which a new-born child can be held to be alive, since we can have no concern with the acts or contracts of such children—can only be to regulate succession, or, by the criminal law, to give a child more protection than a foetus. These facts are determined by the law that settles the succession of the child to its predecessor, or, if the case in question be a case of criminal attempt upon the life of a child, by the criminal law which would have to be brought into action against the same criminal for any other wrong done by him or her in the same place.

DECLARATION OF DEATH OR DISAPPEARANCE. GENERAL PRINCIPLE.

§ 130. It is a more practical inquiry by what law we are to regulate the fictitious destruction of a man's personality by a judicial declaration of death, which is pronounced in particular cases, where there is a complete uncertainty as to whether a person who has been lost to sight is still in life or not. There can be no occasion to inquire into any acts of such a person, or any crime done against him since he disappeared; and such declarations of death can, therefore, have no other object than to settle the rights of inheritance, and the family relations between the person who has disappeared and his connections: the rights of inheritance in a double sense—first, in so far as claims may be made upon the estate of the person who has disappeared; secondly, in so far as he may himself have a claim against another person's estate.¹ As far as family relations are considered, the law which is applied to these for other purposes rules here also. As regards questions of succession, however, cases of the first class are ruled by the law of succession that governs the estate of the missing person; cases of the second class by the law that regulates the succession of the person against whom a claim is made.² The view taken by Fiore and many others,³ that the declaration of death may be regarded as a judgment affecting the status of the person, and on that account is subject to the law of the State to which the person declared or that is to be declared dead belongs,⁴ comes in its result to the same thing, at least in all countries except those in which succession goes by the lex rei sitæ.⁵ For these authors speak of the succession to the property of the missing person, and not of rights of succession falling to him. But the distinction between the two views becomes apparent, if we assume affirmatively that the missing person lived up to the date of the declaration of death, i.e. if we take the law which deals with the disappearance as regulative of the right of the missing person to succeed to other people, or if the lex rei sitæ is to rule the question of succession.⁶

[The Presumption of Life Limitation (Scotland) Act of 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. c. 29), passed to enable the Courts to deal with the estates of persons who have disappeared for a certain time, and are to be presumed to be dead, enacts in its second section ad fin.: "Nothing herein contained shall entitle any person to any part of the intestate moveable succession of a person who has disappeared if the latter was not a domiciled Scotsman at the date at which he is proved or presumed to have disappeared." By its 3rd section the statute regulates succession to heritage situated in Scotland

¹ According to a sound view of the common law of Germany, the declaration of death has only reference to the first class. See Heise and Cropp, Juristische Abhandlungen, ii. p. 142. Pfeiffer, Praktische Ausführungen, iv. p. 362. To a different effect is the proclamation of the Supreme Court of Würtemberg to inferior judicatories, on 17th Aug. 1826. See, too, Supreme Court of Berlin, 6th April 1848 (Striethorst, Entsch. xvii. p. 91). Both of these are reported in Kraut's Grundriss zu Vorlesungen über das deutsche Privatr. Ed. by Frensdorff, 6th ed. 1886, § 34, Nos. 21 and 22.

² To the same effect, Brocher, i. p. 265; to a contrary effect, Supreme Court at Stuttgart, 10th July 1862 (Seuffert, xv. No. 199). But how can a capacity for succession thus attributed to the missing person control the law of succession, which prevails at the domicile of the person to whom he is to succeed? What, too, would be the result if several heirs to the missing man appeared, and several personal laws were pleaded in regard to one and the same inheritance?

⁶ There can be no reference to the personal law of the persons who have obtained the declarator, i.e. the heirs. They enjoy the administration ad interim of the estate also, in accordance with the law of the domicile of the person who is to be declared to be dead. By setting the process in motion, or taking over the administration or enjoyment of the estate, they submit themselves to this law. See Weiss, p. 589.

belonging to one who has disappeared. [The principle of this statute is therefore entirely in accordance with that laid down in the text.]

JURISDICTION OF THE COURTS.

§ 131. It is easy on this matter to determine the competency of the courts. The law which deals on the merits with the declaration of death, decides also what court shall pronounce it.⁷

According to the view, then, which takes nationality as the determinant of personal law, there is no room for admitting the jurisdiction of the courts of the country in which the missing man had merely his domicile or his place of residence: we can only pronounce the courts of the last domicile to be competent, when that is within the State to which he belonged as a citizen.⁸ If, like Weiss (p. 589) and Olivi (Rev. de droit, 1887, p. 520), we allow e.g. a French court to pronounce a declarator of the death of a citizen of the Netherlands, if it can be shown that he had his last known domicile in France, we are landed in insoluble difficulties. There will then be attached to the declaration of the French court—as, in fact, happens with Weiss—effects which it can never have by the law of France, or else the court is forced into pronouncing deliverances which are by the lex fori absolutely incompetent.⁹ It is quite overlooked, too, that any system which attributes far-reaching results to this declaration of death, may possibly, just on that account, attach stringent conditions to such applications.

Every State, however, is entitled to enact provisional regulations as a matter of security,¹⁰ and in particular, to set up a provisional curatory in such cases. Indeed, it is bound to do so, in so far as the missing person has property within its territory, not merely in its own interest, for the maintenance of public order, but even in the interests of humanity. These provisional regulations, however, must cease, so soon as the officials of the missing man's own country take up the matter.¹¹

⁸ By the Hannoverian statute of 23rd May 1848, § 6, it is properly provided that an application for a declaration of death is to be made to the court to which the missing person, as a matter of general jurisdiction, was last subject "in this country."

¹¹ We shall discuss the various presumptions that are recognised as to the period of death of different persons lower down, in treating of Proof. Burge, iv. p. 152, regards the regula-

EXTRA-TERRITORIAL EFFECT.

§ 132. Is a declaration of death or disappearance, pronounced by a competent judge, to be recognised as operative all the world over?

In our view, this question must on principle be answered in the affirmative.¹² The whole matter is simply a prudential regulation for family affairs and questions of succession. Now if, for example, the law of succession were generally to be determined by the personal law, should we not listen to that law, if it enacted that, "Succession to the property of a person, who would be one hundred years old if alive, or who has been absent for a period of ten years without any news of him having reached what was up to that time his domicile, shall be looked upon as having opened"? The judicial process in question merely introduces a series of special precautionary regulations, the purification of which is certified by the judgment. That can be no reason for showing any less respect to the operation of the personal law in another country. Even the jurisprudence of France in this matter recognises the judgment of the competent judge of another country as proof of a fact,¹³ although as a rule, in consequence of the provisions of the Code Civil, apart from international treaties, the judicial sentence of a foreign judge is denied the effect of a res judicata. No doubt, as a declaration of this kind in truth merely creates a presumption, the foreign judge, to whom it is pleaded, must be allowed a certain uncontrolled discretion, in virtue of which he may under certain circumstances require an edictal citation in his own country.¹⁴ tions as to disappearance, and the presumptions thereanent, as mere rules of proof, which the judge must in each case determine by his own law. But, as regards the declaration of death, this view leaves it undetermined, whether the judge can only then hold death to be proved if it has been so proved according to the law of his own country, and before its courts, or whether, and under what conditions, he may allow himself to be convinced by the declaration of death made by foreign courts and according to foreign laws; and this declaration of death is something more than a mere rule of proof, if its object is, as it is according to the common law of Rome, to determine the right of succession and the family relations.

¹² Heffter, § 37, note 5, in spite of my exposition in the first edition of this work, remains of opinion that no judicial declaration of death can take the place of real proof of death, in so far as other States, which either do not have any such doctrine, or whose doctrine on the subject is of another character, are concerned, because a mere legal fiction can claim no recognition in a State to which it does not belong. It is not clear what he means by the expression "of another character;" are trifling differences as to the doctrine sufficient to give the doctrine "another character"? In view, however, of the modern Franco-Italian jurisprudence, it will hardly be necessary to refute in detail Heffter's theory. The question is not one of a capricious imposition of disabilities on certain individuals, but it is a regulation of matters of family status and of property, which is practically necessary, the family and the property having been at the best abandoned to the State, whose subject the missing person was when last heard of. If such declaration by a foreign judge were absolutely refused recognition, the result would be uncertainty and confusion, to the great disadvantage of those concerned.

¹³ See, too, Haus, § 40, No. 146, and the judgments to which he refers.

¹⁴ If, for instance, the two countries in question are very distant from each other. In such cases advertisements in the official journals of the one country are useless in the other.

II. STATUS AND CAPACITY. (Rechts-und Handlungsfähigkeit: État et capacité.)

A. GENERAL DOCTRINES.

INTRODUCTION. LIMITATION AND DEFINITION OF THE RULES OF LAW THAT BELONG TO THIS SUBJECT.

§ 133. It is a custom which has remained from the days of the old statute theory, to treat a very large number of legal rules and legal doctrines, as having to do with the condition or the capacity of persons.¹ This category is seen in its most extended, and therefore also in its vaguest, form here and there in the Franco-Italian jurisprudence of the most modern school, which has raised the personal rights of the individual into a general regulative principle for private international law, limited, it is true, by the public law of the territory. In German jurisprudence, as a rule, it is merely questions of capacity to have rights and capacity to act that are treated in combination, and this point of view is that which is now being more and more commonly adopted by foreign jurists in discussions of particular topics.

It must, however, at the outset be plain that a collective treatment of all the rules of law, which admit of being so turned in expression as to treat of the incapacity of a person for some act, or for the exercise of some right, as the case may be, may lead to general confusion. Such a collective treatment is in truth not a whit better than the distinction taken by Bartolus, which has been so much mocked at, founded on the principle of considering whether the primary subject of the words of a statute was a person or a thing: for almost all propositions of law admit of being expressed in the form that a person is thereby declared capable or incapable of doing something. For example, if a man is not owner of a thing, it may be said, he is incapable of disposing of it. If a son, because he is not yet emancipated, requires his father's consent before he can enter on any legal transaction, it may be said that he is incapable per se of entering on it, etc., etc. We can thus account for the fact that, if we undertake to set up a principle of so much generality as the principle which shall regulate the law of status, the capacity or incapacity of a person, we shall to a certain extent stumble at every corner on practical impossibilities, and involve ourselves in contradictions, which must needs be removed by capricious limitations and exceptions to such an extent, in many cases, that there is little more than a shadow left of the comprehensive principle which was laid down with the utmost assurance at the outset. The distinction between the existence of a legal condition per se on the one hand, which according to the theory of many shall be recognised at once in foreign countries according to the standard of the law of the country to which the person belongs, and, on the other hand, the effects produced by this legal condition, which are not recognised in foreign countries—as if a man's legal condition was something perceptible to the senses, like his complexion, or the colour of his hair—is a mere feat of logic, by means of which we can prove everything and nothing, and the magic power of which will always find some believers. Exactly the same thing is to be said of the modern and more dangerous theory of the public interest, according to which, again, the effects of a legal condition or state of capacity may be refused recognition in a foreign country.

§ 134. Let us with these observations consider shortly the course of the historical development of this part of our subject: we must first notice that, as a rule, the following legal topics are treated together under this head, viz. (1) nobility, slavery, civil death, frequently, too, the capacity to inherit, to acquire real property, the loss of reputation (infamy), restrictions on civil capacity by admission into priestly order, the incapacity of juristic and other persons for certain modes of acquisition; and also (2) minority and majority, the incapacity of women for some or for all the acts of civil life, the incapacity of certain other persons for special solemnities attaching to legal acts, the operation of the withdrawal of the capacity to dispose by a declaration of prodigality.

The older authors proceeded (cf. supra, § 18) on the assumption that the legislator can only provide for the persons of his own subjects; while, as a rule, foreigners are to be exempted from our laws. If, then, as in all questions relating to this subject, there is a doubt about the habilitas or inhabilitas of the person, the lex domicilii of the person in question is to rule.² The only question is, In what cases are we to assume that there is a habilitas or inhabilitas of the person? It is obvious that this theory is untenable according to the modern conceptions of sovereignty; and yet, as we shall hereafter see, it has substantially contributed to form a customary law for Europe.

A later theory starts from the conception of the peculiar and individual character of the person. If the personality of a foreigner is to be recognised, it is said, then the legislature must also recognise the attributes of it; for the attributes are indissolubly bound up with the person. As, then, the person of the foreigner is closely subjected to the law of his domicile, so the universal applicability of the leges domicilii to all the attributes of the person results as a consequence. “Statuta in personas directa quaeque certam eis qualitatem affigunt, transeunt cum personis extra territorium statuentium, ut persona ubique sit uniformis ejusque unus status."³

Others express it thus: "The *status*⁴ of a person must be the same everywhere." The difficulty for the upholders of this theory is to define what laws give a person his attributes, his status. Some stand by the general proposition that, if the law makes a person capable or incapable of any relation, this is plainly a statute which will be everywhere recognised in foreign countries as a personal statute,⁵ be this declaration of capacity or incapacity to enter upon legal transactions and to acquire rights a general one, or merely extending to some special transactions and rights.⁶ Others again only allow the lex domicilii to decide, if it determines the whole status of the person, but do not allow it to do so if the person is declared capable or incapable with reference to some particular acts only. As a matter of fact, rules of law of all kinds may be so expressed that a person is thereby declared capable or incapable of some particular act (e.g. the rubric—"The half of every succession, unless the deceased shall have the power of testing upon it, falls to the heir-at-law," is equivalent to "every man has the capacity of testing upon the half of his estate"); and so this rule seems suspicious if stated without restriction.⁷ The point most at issue is as to what is to be the decision in cases where we are concerned with the capacity or incapacity for particular acts, and not with the entire status; and it is often excessively difficult to decipher the proper meaning from the obscure expressions of the author. According to Argentræus (§§ 16-18), a statute of the former kind is always a real statute, which is dependent upon the lex rei sitæ. The strange distinction of Burgundus (i. § 3, ii. § 4), who holds that the lex domicilii should rule so far as the question is one of personal obligation, but the lex rei sitæ, on the contrary, so far as the question is one as to the transference of a real right, has been already (§ 20) mentioned.⁸ It would be difficult to reconcile this rule with the principles of any law so as to hold a transference good, where the cedent had not the power to undertake the personal obligation involved in the transference. P. Voet⁹ denies altogether the operation of any statutum personale in reference to foreign real property.¹⁰ Others make a distinction, in the case of special statutes which do not determine the entire status, between those which concern persons and those which concern things: in the former case they allow the lex domicilii, in the latter the lex rei sitæ to rule.¹¹ Here, too, as in the case of the theory of statuta personalia, realia, and mixta, it is impossible to determine when a statute refers to a person, and when it refers to a thing. But from the illustrations which these older writers employ, one sees plainly that their theory of these special capacities and incapacities is merely an attempt to carry out universally rules which have been found to fit the expressions of some particular system of law in the subject of succession and the property of married persons. In this connection they had generally before them the rules of the older Germanic law, by which succession and the rights of married persons were special modes of acquiring individual assets of property, and in which, by well-established usage, the lex rei sitæ alone was applicable. These rules spoke of the capacity or incapacity of persons, with reference only to the testamentary instructions of a testator, or the power of spouses to give each other property, and these expressions had in one way or another to be brought into harmony with the general theory, which made the lex domicilii the rule for determining the capacity or incapacity of persons.

⁸ He is followed, for instance, by Stockmanns (decis. p. 125, Nos. 10, 11) and Christianæus (vol. ii. decis. 56, No. 7) ; so, too, Story, § 431. The whole theory is explained by the desire not to fall into conflict with the rule recognised as necessary, by which the lex rei sitæ determines the succession (according to many other French writers, and according to English law). Most of the illustrations cited by the supporters of this theory have reference to the capacity to execute a testament.

⁹ Cap. 2, § 4, No. 6 ; cf., too, No. 9.

The same controversies may be found among the authors who refer the validity of the lex domicilii to the mere comitas of the foreign legislator, and to a customary law.¹²

Wächter sets up a special theory as to the import of this customary law (ii. p. 172).¹³ The attributes of foreigners, in so far as they are recognised by the law of our land, must be determined by their own law unless there is some provision with us with reference to attributes of the kind, by which it is plainly intended to lay down a rule for every one unconditionally, no matter whence he comes. On the other hand, the court must determine the legal operation of these attributes according to the laws of its own State, unless the question is merely one as to the capacity of a foreigner in a foreign land to enter upon contracts, and to oblige himself, which must be determined by the laws of his own State only.¹⁴ A foreigner then, who, by the law of his home, is still a minor, must be treated by us also as a minor, but our courts will only allow him the same rights as our laws allow to our minors. If he claims a restitutio in integrum from our courts on account of his personal privilege as a minor, the judge can only give him that in so far as our laws permit it. A foreigner, who is a nobleman by the laws of his own country, is also to be held a nobleman by ours, but our judges cannot give him any rights on account of his nobility, except what our laws give our noblemen.

Savigny¹⁵ establishes the universal validity of the lex domicilii, by pointing out that it is impossible to apply any other law than that local law to which the person belongs by residence, to the various personal conditions and qualities by which his status is to be determined. He rejects the distinction taken by Wächter between these attributes themselves and their operation, as also the distinction between a general and a special capacity for contract, and the only exception he admits is in the case of institutions of an anomalous character, which lie outside the limits of the community of law that obtains among independent States, e.g. the capacity for polygamy, or the incapacity of certain religious persons to acquire property. It is only in such exceptional cases that the law recognised at the seat of the court is to rule.¹⁶

A fourth theory is founded on the consideration that the tie which exists between the State and individual subjects thereof is not undone by a temporary residence in a foreign country, and therefore the subjects of a State, even in a foreign country, remain subject to their native laws (Hert, iv. c. 8; Renaud, D. Privatr. i. § 43, p. 103). This consideration, however, falls to be rejected, in respect that, although the State may rule its own subjects according to its own laws, in case its courts may have to decide the question, the foreign State is in no sense bound to assent to this. (Wächter, ii. p. 169; Story, § 73.) An argument, specially advanced by Renaud, upon the ground that different States mutually recognise each other, contributes nothing to the determination of any question of private law: the State can require no more than that, as regards political rights and duties, her subject shall not be compelled to duties, and shall not share in rights, so long as he remains her subject, which are inconsistent with that character.

Others allow the lex domicilii to rule, on the ground that personal attributes constitute the vested rights of all persons (e.g. Maurenbrecher, i. § 144). We have, however, already said all that is necessary on the theory of vested rights (p. 80): against the application of it to the law of status we have also this consideration, that, even by the laws of one and the same State, such personal attributes, as they are called, cannot be held to be vested rights.

We may adduce the following considerations to meet all other theories, whether they assume the validity of the lex domicilii a priori, or establish it upon a law of custom. The rules of law we are now dealing with, it is said, have to do with the condition and attributes of the person. This condition and these attributes are, however, clearly of a legal character; they exist by force of a positive law, and when that law ceases, these legal attributes themselves cease also. If, then, by a logical process, we deduce the universal validity of a rule of law from the fact that it determines the attributes of a person, that is a mere analogy drawn from the physical attributes and conditions of persons, which, no doubt, remain the same in every country, and is an inadmissible argument. A law that deals with the attributes of persons, according to the common form of expression, has this precise meaning, that rules of law different from the ordinary rules are to be applied to some particular legal relations of some particular persons more definitely designated by certain facts. But then it happens that the law has attached to certain actual peculiarities of certain persons, which are either permanent or exist for a considerable time, the application of a number of important rules, which differ from the ordinary rules. One is then accustomed to designate these actual de facto peculiarities as legal attributes and conditions of the person. But it is entirely arbitrary which of these actual physical peculiarities shall retain a name that shows their legal significance; and, for instance, alongside of the ordinary class of "minors," "majors," "prodigals," "nobles,"¹⁷ and so on, one might set other classes, such as "landowners," "absentees," "burgesses," "rustics," "those without rights of succession," etc. If there is, therefore, asserted to be a general customary law, which lays down that the attributes of a person, or his condition in the eye of the law, shall be determined by the law of his domicile, it must be shown in detail what are these actual attributes and peculiarities attaching to a person, which are to have, even in foreign countries, some particular legal effect, because by the laws of the domicile of the person to whom they belong they have such an effect, even although the law of the foreign country may attach no such effect to them. It is not allowable to proceed by inference from one set of facts to another because both of them are described as attributes of the person; it is only possible to proceed on grounds which justify an analogous extension of rules of law in other cases. We shall enquire specially, in the case of each particular legal institution, how far the results that follow from general logical principles are modified by customary law.

Authors who take as their starting-point the conception of legal attributes, or the legal condition of the person, acknowledge, as a matter of fact, that in certain cases exceptions are admitted—as, for instance, in the case of slavery or civil death; but if it were a logical truth that the attributes of a person are to be recognised as operative all the world over, there could not be any exceptions at all recognised. It is, however, quite conceivable that the courts of one country should hold a person to be incapable of contracting, while those of another hold him capable, and that the lex fori should rule; or that a man who cannot validly enter upon contracts in his own country should be held by the courts of all countries to be capable of contracting in questions as to obligations on which he has entered in another country, and that so the lex loci contractus should rule. In support of this latter theory, which prevails largely in English and American practice, there can at least be urged reasons of expediency of no light weight.

Again, as regards the lex fori, which is adopted by some authorities as generally regulative of such questions in consequence of the general principles which they assume, and is adopted by others as regulative of cases in which anomalous legal institutions are to be dealt with, we have here simply to refer to the general discussions which we have already gone through. The tendency of modern theories—and it is a sound tendency—rejects such a recourse to the lex fori, which is the result of despair of finding another solution, and makes the rights of parties dependent on the accident of whether the suit is proceeding in this or in that country.

NONE BUT THOSE LEGAL PROPOSITIONS WHICH ARE CONCERNED WITH CAPACITY TO HAVE RIGHTS, AND THOSE WHICH ARE CONCERNED WITH CAPACITY TO ACT, BELONG TO THIS PART OF THE SUBJECT.

§ 135. There is only one outlet from all this confusion,¹⁸ viz. to lay down a precise definition of the rules and propositions of law which go to constitute the idea of personality in the legal sense. These rules and propositions are the rules and propositions which deal with the capacity of having rights (i.e. status), and those which deal with the capacity to act. No other rules and propositions touch the essence of personality, they merely operate on certain particular rights that belong to persons and affect them.

It follows, in the first place, from the conception of a person, that he should be the subject of rights; not, however, that he should have any particular concrete rights; it is, however, indispensable for an individual who is to take rank as a person, that he should have the capacity of having rights. The second test of personality, which is not, to be accurate, necessarily bound up with the conception of personality in every case, but which is indispensable for general legal intercourse, consists in this, that the person should have a legally operative will, that is, should be capable of acting. Rules of law as to capacity to act belong, therefore, to this subject; persons are, by the very meaning of the term, capable of legal rights and legal acts; a condition of affairs in which persons should not, as a rule, be capable of acting, would hardly be conceivable. In cases, therefore, where it is only particular concrete rights which are conceded or denied to a person, there is no question of the essence of the person, but merely of accidental circumstances belonging to that conception. One might be disposed to include in our subject the family rights of a person, but a complete personality is not, according to modern legal conceptions, conditioned by the fact that the person belongs to a particular family.¹⁹

¹⁹ The distinction mentioned above as having been taken by Wächter, between the attributes of a person and the legal operation of these attributes, rests upon a confusion between the privileges of special classes of persons, which occur in concrete legal relations, and the capacity to enjoy rights and to act, that is to say, the rights of personality in the proper sense. It is, for instance, quite accidental whether or not a minor is in a position to avail himself of the privileges which belong to minors on the head of prescription of actions, or by the in integrum restitutio; he may by the law of the land to which he belongs be a minor, and so incapable of acting, and yet by that law be denied the privileges belonging to prescription of actions, or the in integrum restitutio. Both depend on the system of law to which the legal relations, wherein it is desired to make use of these privileges, are subject: the privileges attaching to the prescription of actions are merely an abrogation of prescription for that particular case, and so, too, with the in integrum restitutio, which constitutes a ground for withdrawal from a legal relation already entered upon, or for the restoration of a legal position that has been lost. Whether a man, who by the law of his domicile is a minor, but a major by the lex loci actus, could claim the privileges which the latter law gives to minors, depends upon whether this law gives such privileges only to persons up to a certain age, or to all those who, because of their minority, are under guardianship, and cannot attend to their own affairs. In reason we must take the latter solution, and, as the facts are in accordance therewith, those persons who by the law of their homes are under guardianship, may lay claim to these privileges (cf., however, remarks on the in integrum restitutio, infra, § 154). Even although the examples given by Wächter are rightly determined by him, the counter argument of Savigny is applicable, if it is sought to apply that distinction to the status and capacity of a person. "That distinction," says Savigny, § 362, Guthrie, p. 150, "between the attributes of a person and their legal effects, rests simply upon the circumstance that many conditions of the person are designated with special names, while others are not. This accidental and indifferent circumstance cannot justify the application of different territorial laws to them. We call him major who has the

MORE ACCURATE DEFINITION OF THE CAPACITY TO ACT.

§ 136. We must, however, limit the capacity to act, in the sense which is to prevail here, to the undertaking of legal acts inter vivos.²⁰ This is inferred from the fact that personality ceases with a man's death. The testator does not, in an accurate sense, dispose of his property: all that he can do is to bring it about by a declaration of his will that one person shall or shall not inherit an aggregate of assets, and shall or shall not take over an aggregate of obligations, which up to this time have been united in his person. The privilege of making testamentary dispositions does not belong either to those essential conceptions which necessarily go to make up an individual person, or to the conceptions of those attributes which usually belong to one. This proposition may be shown to be apposite by the illustration already given. It is quite conceivable that in some countries, as was the case in Germany in old times, testamentary dispositions should not be recognised; dispositions inter vivos are, however, indispensable for the intercourse of life.^{21 22}

We have a true case of limitation of capacity to act, if the law withdraws from a person the capacity of disposing of some particular class of assets, it may be real property: for instance, the law may forbid one who has been, as an exceptional measure, declared by the special indulgence of the State to be of full age, but who is de facto still a minor, to alienate his landed estate. Doubts, however, may be raised as to fullest capacity to act that age can give him; it is, therefore, merely a name for certain legal effects, for the negation of certain earlier limitations on his capacity. So, too, we call him minor who does not as yet enjoy that full capacity. If a law, however, lays down certain stages of capacity for minors, without giving these stages any special name, there is no reason why these stages of capacity should not be determined by the law of the domicile as well as the entry upon full capacity."

This reasoning, however, destroys Savigny's own theory as well. He, too, derives the application of the lex domicilii from the fact that it deals with the legal condition of the person as affected by the various rules of law in question. The special legal condition of a person is, however, merely a way of expressing that under certain circumstances special rules of law are to be applied to the person in question which are not applicable to the legal relations of other persons. See to this effect, and against Wächter, Stobbe, § 30, No. 10, Muheim, pp. 106, 107.

²⁰ In the first edition, I further limited the conception of capacity to act to the capacity of disposing of one's property. This limitation goes too far; it does not take into consideration that there are important legal acts that have nothing to do with property, and capacity to do which is yet a naturale of personality, e.g. capacity to give consent to a marriage.

²¹ The theory by which the capacity of making a testament is to be treated on the same principles as are recognised in the case of capacity to act, would lead to this unsound result, that the testamenti factio would be ruled solely by that personal law which attached to the testator at the time he made his settlement, without any reference to his personal law at the date of his death.

whether we have a case of true incapacity to act (although there plainly is some limitation of that capacity), in cases where the law merely refuses to allow a person to undertake particular legal transactions, e.g. to undertake obligations by bill, or in respect of loans of money, but in other respects leaves him with full capacity to dispose of every asset of his property. In my former edition, I expressed myself to the effect that in such a case we should not hold that there was a true limitation of capacity to act. In support of this view, it may be urged that it is quite possible that a legal transaction of some particular class should be refused recognition all over a State, but at the same time it would be impossible to say that all the inhabitants of that State were incapable of acting. We might take the case of a country in which the law of bills was unknown. It is, however, unnecessary to decide this difficult question here, for the particular rules of customary law, which prevail on the Continent of Europe, have on a sound view no validity or application in the case of these special incapacities to act, such as the incapacity of certain classes of persons to undertake obligations by bill or on a contract of loan.

FUNDAMENTAL DISTINCTION IN THE INTERNATIONAL TREATMENT OF THE CAPACITY TO HAVE RIGHTS, ON THE ONE HAND, AND THE CAPACITY TO ACT, ON THE OTHER.

§ 137. If we propose to treat the rules of law as to capacity to have rights, and those as to capacity to act, together, we only do so in deference to the systematic treatment which has been traditionally adopted. In truth, a fundamental distinction must be recognised between those two classes of legal rules in private international law.

The rules of law, which deal with the legal capacity of a person, determine under what conditions an individual is to be viewed as a legal subject, either generally or in relation to particular isolated rights. It might readily be supposed that, as soon as a question about a foreigner was raised, the actual conditions which are recognised by the laws of the domicile of the foreigner should be substituted for the conditions under which any proposition of law that touches legal capacity is applied to natives. A man, therefore, who by the law of his domicile could not acquire real property, would be equally disabled here, just because he was a foreigner. This would, however, imply a decided encroachment upon a principle which is assumed in modern international law, viz. that foreigners and natives have the like capacity in the eye of the law.

At the same time, the following considerations prevent this conclusion. Those rules of law, on which the capacity of individuals to have rights depends, rest really upon the political and moral ideas of a nation. If the law recognised at the domicile of the foreigner were to rule, it would often happen that the very facts and circumstances which would with us confer full rights or some special right, would constitute in his case a ground of disability (e.g. in one country Catholics alone, in another Protestants alone, can acquire real property).

Lastly, there are certain rules of law affecting legal capacity which can only be carried out because definite public regulations actually exist in one State, while these regulations do not exist at all, or cannot be applied to the particular case, in some other State where the person concerned is actually resident: (e.g. How is it possible to treat a man as civilly dead because he has been sentenced abroad, for a crime committed in another country, to a punishment involving civil death, if he resides in this country, and has not been surrendered by us to the foreign criminal authorities or confined in prison?)

We may say, therefore, that the question is to be resolved just as if the foreign law did not exist at all, and all we need regard is whether the actual conditions are present which are essential to the application of some rule that increases or diminishes legal capacity according to that system of law under which the question otherwise falls.²³

If we are concerned, therefore, with the acquisition of real property, the lex rei sitæ will determine the question of the capacity of the foreigner to acquire it.²⁴

§ 138. Rules of law which are concerned with the capacity to act have quite a different purpose.^{25 26} It is not their object to withdraw the ²³ In agreement with this, Stobbe, § 38, ii.; Muheim, § 14 (p. 108). The latter says very soundly, "If our State submits some particular legal relation to foreign law, it must logically also submit the capacity for it to the determination of that law: for the whole matter is a question of the enjoyment of some foreign legal system, and has nothing to do with any interest belonging to our legal system."

²⁵ The strict separation of capacity to have rights, on the one hand, from the capacity to act, upon the other, which I upheld in my former edition, is disregarded by the majority of writers, who refuse to enter upon a minute examination of details, which is so important in private international law, and that although the distinction is obvious, and comes up in every concrete decision upon these matters. They prefer to throw these entirely distinct classes of rules together (without thinking of the contradiction which lies in their assertion at the same time of the equality in law of foreigners and natives), and escape from the subject with some indefinite reference to the compulsory character of certain laws, or to their economical or moral objects, or, as in the procedure of the Franco-Italian jurisprudence, to the public interest, as if the laws as to minority, for instance, were not just as much as any others enacted in the public interest. I am glad to see, on the other hand, that in the careful and thorough exposition of private international law in Stobbe's D. Privatr. (i. § 30, præs. note 11), a sharp separation of the capacity to have rights from the capacity to act has found approval. R. Schmidt (p. 30) seems, too, to approve of the separation; but he confuses the subject by the introduction of things that have no connection with capacity of having rights, e.g. the restitution of minors. More recently the distinction has been recognised by Rossel, Manuel du possession and the enjoyment of certain rights from those who are incapacitated ; it is their care that such persons shall not involve themselves in loss by their own acts. This care for the person must be a permanent one, if it is to have effect ; it extends, therefore, to all persons who permanently belong to the State, i.e. who are domiciled there. It is, no doubt, conceivable that a system of law should recognise consistently as minors all foreigners who had not attained the particular age fixed by that law as the age of majority ; but this could only be carried out, if at the same time there were established a guardianship for foreigners who were resident in our country only temporarily.²⁷ It is, however, plain that this requirement (and it would be necessary to establish a guardianship for every incapacitated person) could not be carried out, and, as a matter of fact, no one has ever thought of developing the idea. It necessarily follows, without the necessity of proof of the existence of any customary law, according to the reasonable sense of the statutes on the subject, that one who is capable of acting by the law of his own country must be treated by the courts of all countries as capable.²⁸

A SPECIAL CUSTOMARY LAW AMONG THE STATES OF THE CONTINENT OF EUROPE IN REGARD TO CAPACITY TO ACT.

§ 139. The converse of this proposition, viz. that any one who by the laws of his own domicile is incapable of acting, is to be recognised as incapable everywhere, cannot, on the other hand, be shown to follow as a necessary logical inference. On the contrary, the inference from the droit civil de la Suisse Romande, Basel 1886, p. 10, and v. Martens, § 70. W. Dolk, Internationaal Privaatr. i. Utrecht 1880, specially insists upon the distinction. Roth, D. Privatr. p. 283, first throws the two together, and subsequently makes the distinction, without laying any foundation for it. Weiss, p. 543, makes this distinction, "L'état de la personne consiste dans ce qu'elle est : sa capacité consiste dans ce qu'elle peut, au regard du droit." But this is a distinction which in truth is no distinction. That which a person in the eye of the law is, is merely another way of expressing that which in the eye of the law he has power to do. A man is of full age = a man has full powers of disposing ; a man is under age = a man has not full powers of disposing. This deliverance does not advance us a step, and I cannot see that Weiss has taken anything by it.

²⁶ Brocher (Nouv. Tr. p. 90) also recognises, although somewhat indistinctly, that a difference must be made between status, or capacity to have rights, and capacity to act. The "Incapacités naturelles," which, according to Brocher, will as a rule have operation in other countries, are limitations of the capacity to act : his "Incapacités sociales" are limitations on status, or the capacity to have rights.

²⁷ No doubt there is in some countries a system of guardianship for those who have landed property ; that is explained by the fact that principles of feudal law are either still recognised there, or erroneously adhered to ; but it does not furnish any objection to our theory, since on the opposite assumption there would have to be a special system of guardianship established for foreigners who had no landed property.

²⁸ In so far I am unable to agree with the following observation of Wächter (ii. p. 177) : "It is not a necessary consequence of the silence of our laws as to the status of foreigners, that they intend to proclaim that their general provisions on that head are inapplicable to foreigners, unless they specially confine them to their own subjects."

purpose of these laws as to incapacity to act, as already expounded, is that foreigners, if they have the capacity to act by the laws of the country where the transaction which may be in question takes place, must be held to have that capacity by the courts of all countries except those of their native country, and those of any other where a similar law to that recognised in their own country is in force. It may be laid down that the legislature will never be inclined to show greater protective care for foreigners than for its own subjects, and if it proclaims that the latter, on attaining a certain age, no longer stand in need of the care which it exercises over minors, but are quite fit to protect their own interests, it would seem thereby to lay down a similar rule for foreigners.²⁹

Here, however, we are met by a customary law, which is recognised at least all over the Continent of Europe, according to which this logical deduction is pushed aside, and in this second case also foreigners are judged by the law of their domicile. The origin of this customary law, of which we will give a more particular exposition in connection with the different legal institutions, is explained by the gradual nature of the development of the idea of sovereignty in the individual European States. Jurists looked upon all territorial laws, which deviated from the common imperial, i.e. the Roman law, as statutes binding only upon persons who either voluntarily subjected themselves to them (a case that often happened when new towns were founded or new laws enacted), or for whom there could be invented a fiction of voluntary subjection to them, as in the case of those who committed some delict which was punishable according to the particular law there recognised, although not so by common law. Hence came the rule that a law which concerned the person was not

²⁹ This is the result at which the Supreme Court of Louisiana arrived as the ground of a judgment, [Saul and his Creditors, 17 Martin 596,] which is, it must be said, assailed by Story. Story, § 75, says: "Now, supposing the case of our law, fixing the age of majority at twenty-five, and the country in which a man was born and lived previous to his coming here, placing it at twenty-one, no objection could, perhaps, be made to the rule just stated. And it may be, and we believe would be, true that a contract made here at any time between the two periods already mentioned would bind him. But reverse the facts of the case, and suppose, as is the truth, that our law placed the age of majority at twenty-one; that twenty-five was the period at which a man ceased to be a minor in the country where he resided; and that at the age of twenty-four he came into this State, and entered into contracts: would it be permitted that he should in our courts, and to the demand of one of our citizens, plead as to protection against his engagement, the law of a foreign country of which the people of Louisiana had no knowledge?"

But it is not the mere ground of expediency, that the inhabitants of one country are not bound to know the laws of another, that is to determine the question.

R. Schmid (p. 43), who, without any detailed investigation, rejects the customary law, to which we are immediately to refer, argues purely in the style we have indicated. But he goes so far as to read the conclusion that a man who would be of full capacity, e.g. of full age, by our law, whereas by the law of his own country he would not be, ought to be treated as of full capacity by our courts, even in cases in which the question relates to a contract concluded in his own country, which is the country of both parties. His reason is a simple one, that to be treated as a minor is an advantage, which our courts cannot be the means of bestowing in larger measure on foreigners than upon our own countrymen. It is a good thing for international intercourse that Schmid stands almost alone in these views.

binding on foreigners, a rule which applies to cases of the kind in question if it is to have any application at all, since the care of the person of the incapacitated is very prominent in these statutes.

To that too was added the fact, which, as we have seen, favoured the rise of the rule "locus regit actum"—viz. that all the law courts of Christendom were considered as belonging to one great empire united under the Emperor and Pope, if not de facto, at least de jure. Now, if we take a case of incapacity to act, which has its origin in a judicial decree—the incapacity of the prodigal—this must receive effect everywhere (as the decrees of one court must be recognised by every other court), if it was the deliverance of the judex domicilii, and what had been laid down by the judex domicilii must also have been laid down by the enactment of the legislator of the domicile, particularly as in the Middle Ages the functions of the judge and legislator were frequently united in one and the same person.³⁰ This theory, dating from the days of the later commentators, has been followed by almost all writers down to the most recent times, with a very few exceptions. They disputed over special cases, which were by many improperly ranked alongside of questions of capacity to act; they did not define accurately their conception of that capacity, and thus, in their endeavours to unite a recognised system of practice and all its detailed consequences with their theory of the universal validity of the lex domicilii, they set up inconsistent and capricious rules: but in the cases, which, according to the theory we have laid down, belong to the subject of capacity to act, they, and the courts too in their judgments, made the lex domicilii the fountain, even although, like J. Voet³¹ and many of his followers, they derived the general recognition of this law from the practice of friendly intercourse among individual States, the so-called Comitas Nationum, and not from logical considerations. The Legislature in many cases attached itself to this theory.³²

LAW OF ENGLAND.

§ 140. On the other hand, the law of the United States decides questions of capacity to act according to the lex loci contractus. This position is defended on the ground of the protection it affords to commercial intercourse against appeals to foreign laws unknown to one of the parties.³³ The English doctrine at one time³⁴ would take no other point of view than this, but more lately it has become unsettled, and seems to be tending in the same direction as continental opinion. Particularly—and this is a matter to which we shall recur again—capacity to marry is more and more tested by the law of the country where the party has his home, and the pressure of logic seems to be forcing lawyers to treat other contracts on the same footing. Foote, however (p. 31), still describes the principle of determining the question, in so far as it bears on the transactions of ordinary business life, according to the lex loci actus, as a practical course.³⁵

NOTE F. ON §§ 137-140, INTERNATIONAL RULES AS TO CAPACITY TO ACT.

[The subject is so fully discussed in the text, and the references to different authorities are so complete, that there is little to add. Reference the Papal States; § 33, §§ 4 and 34 of the Austrian statute book (on this cf. Savigny, § 363, Guthrie, p. 156; note on Unger, p. 163) expressly recognise that a foreigner's personal capacity to act is to be determined by the lex domicilii, not merely in the case of subjects who enter into contracts abroad, but also in the case of foreigners who enter into contracts in the territory of these States. Codex Maximil. Bavaricus, civ. i. 2, 17. It is silently implied in the provisions of the Code Civil, art. 3. (So, too, the universal opinion of French jurists, confirmed by constant judgments of their courts, Fœlix, p. 64.) The same provision is to be found in the 12th article of the Sardinian statute book, article 3rd of the statute book for the Canton Wallis, article 3rd of the new statute book for the kingdom of Poland, article 9th of the statute book of Louisiana. Codice Civ. Italiano dispos. gen. art. 6: "Lo stato e la capacità delle persone ed i rapporti di famiglia sono regolati dalla legge della nazione a cui esse appartengono." See a series of French and Italian decisions given by Fiore. Append. p. 542, Decision of the Senate of Warsaw of 1873 (Jour. i. p. 48). In Spain, too (Torres Campos, p. 279), capacity (la aptitud y la capacidad legal) is decided by the law of the domicile. The 23rd, 34th, and 35th sections of the introduction to the Allgem. Preuss. Landrecht contain express recognition of the view defended here as applicable to foreigners who deal in Prussia, although there are one-sided modifications in favour of native Prussians. Prussian Gerichtssordnung, i. Tit. 1, §§ 5, 6. See Savigny, § 363.

We must draw a clear line of distinction between capacity in the sense in which we have used it (see definition in §§ 135, 136) and capacity for delicts, i.e. capacity to incur obligations by committing an illegal act. (Cf. Muheim, p. 130.) This is without exception to be ruled by the law to which the illegal act is in itself subject, in our view, therefore, by the lex loci actus.

³³ Story, §§ 75 et seq.; Wharton, §§ 112 et seq.; præs. § 115. This view, as far as German writers are concerned, I find nowhere except in Heineccius, Pract. ii. 11, sec. 5. Alef's view (§ 32) stands quite alone: "Quoties de habilitate personae est disceptatio, toties praevallet statutum quod actui resistit, ideoque quod agitur effectu caret."

³⁴ Burge, i. pp. 27, 28.

³⁵ See Westlake, p. 43 et seq.; Phillimore, § 382, says as to the Anglo-American doctrine, that it is distinguished by a "painful and clumsy inconsistency."

may be made to the last chapter of Lord Fraser's work on "Parent and Child," p. 570 et seq., for an exhaustive discussion of the principles of international law applicable to the present question. His lordship comes to the conclusion that in Scotland the lex domicilii will determine whether a person is to be considered a minor or of full age, and will also determine what are the privileges of minority. This rule needs no qualification in cases where the foreigner alone is principally concerned: his personal and domestic relations, his powers of managing his estate, and generally all questions other than questions of contract, will be solved, in so far as they are affected by the minority of the foreigner, according to his own personal law—i.e. the law of his domicile. But when questions of contract emerge, the rule must be qualified: we have then to deal with the interests of a Scotsman who has contracted with a foreigner, as well as with those of the foreigner himself, and international law must deal fairly with both parties. The question for solution in such cases will always be, did the Scotsman know the condition and status of the person with whom he contracted; did he use reasonable care and prudence; was he put upon his enquiry; and has he by his own neglect placed himself in a position of disadvantage? If he has acted prudently and with reasonable care, and if there was nothing in the appearance of the other party or the nature of the transaction to raise enquiry, justice requires that the lex loci contractus should govern the rights of parties, and that the foreigner should not be able to shield himself by appealing to his own law of status, of which the other party was ignorant, and to which his attention was not directed.

The rule admits, according to his lordship, of another exception; obligations in re mercatoria by a minor engaged in trade, and debts for board and lodging, will bind a foreigner as much as a native, and upon the same grounds.

In England there seems to be doubt whether minority and majority are to be determined by the law of the place of the contract in question or by the law of the domicile of the person: on the one hand, in Simonin v. Mallac, 1860, 2 S. and T. 77, a learned judge says: "In general, the personal competency and incompetency of individuals to contract has been held to depend upon the law of the place where the contract is made;" while, on the other hand, the very high authority of Lord Westbury sanctions the statement that "the civil status is governed universally by one single principle—namely, that of domicile, which is the criterion established by law for the purpose of determining civil status. For it is on this basis that the personal rights of the party—that is to say, the law which determines his majority or minority, his marriage, succession, testacy, or intestacy—must depend" (Udny v. Udny, 1869, L. R. 1, Sc. App. 457 and Court of Sess. Reps. 3rd ser. vii. H. of L. p. 89). Westlake, pp. 45, 46, inclines to the view that the doctrine of Lord Westbury may be taken as likely to be regulative of English law in the future. In a recent case in the House of Lords (Cooper v. Cooper, Feb. 24, 1888, Court of Sess. Reps.

4th ser. xv. p. 21), which was taken on appeal from the Scots courts, the question was raised whether an Irish lady, not of full age, and therefore by the law of Ireland incapable of contracting, could on the head of minority alone set aside a marriage contract, which she had executed on her marriage with a Scotsman, it being the intention of the parties that their married life should be passed in Scotland. The House held, that the contract having been made in the country in which she was domiciled, no conflict of law arose, for it could not be contended that, by contemplating a different country as the place of the fulfilment of the contract, i.e. contemplating a change of domicile after the contract should be made, the lady could alter the capacity which she then had.

Lord Macnaghten, however, says of the question as to whether the law of the domicile of the party, or the law of the place where the contract is made, is to determine that party's competency or incompetency to contract: "Perhaps in this country the question is not finally settled, though the preponderance of opinion here, as well as abroad, seems to be in favour of the law of the domicile." The doctrine so laid down does not seem to be confined to questions of alleged incapacity or capacity on account of age, but to be of general application (see Westlake, p. 45 et seq.). This judgment, like that of Lord Westbury, will be applicable to English and Scots law alike. Although it may be accepted as a statement of the general principle, the exceptions by which Lord Fraser, as we have seen, qualifies the law of Scotland, may quite fairly be grafted on it.

In America the rule seems to be laid down by Story, as cited by the author—viz. that the lex loci contractus rules (cf. the case of Saul and his creditors, cited supra, note 29, and by Story).

The French law in its general statement is that the term of minority is always to be ascertained by reference to the law of the country of the foreigner's nationality; and, for example, a Cuban, by whose native law the age of majority is twenty-five, is held incapable of contracting in France before attaining that age (Trib. civ. de la Seine, Ferron v. de Santa Venia, 1878, Jour. v. p. 502). But this rule is qualified by another—viz. that French courts will protect French creditors, if they have acted in good faith and without rashness. A Cuban of twenty-two years of age, who by the law of his own country would not attain majority till twenty-five, whereas in France twenty-one is the age of majority, had accepted certain bills, and had stated thereon that he was domiciled in France; the bank which discounted these bills had not been in direct communication with him, but had made inquiries from one of his creditors who had been the medium between them, and had been assured of the full capacity of the acceptor. In these circumstances, the plea of incapacity was repelled (Fourgeand v. Comte de Santa Venia; Cour de Paris, 1879, Jour. vi. p. 488). Again, in the case of Cussac v. Hartog, 1883 (Jour. x. 290), the Cour de Paris held that the rule of a foreigner's personal statute could not be applied, without modification, in the case of a foreigner resident in France for a short time only, so as to benefit him at the expense of French traders, who had dealt with him without any undue want of precaution, and from whom he had concealed the fact that he was a foreigner. The same rule was applied in the case of Gache v. Drake del Castillo, 1886 (Jour. xiv. 178), by the Tribunal of the Seine. (See the text of § 142 infra.)

In Belgium the rule is that the status of each person is determined by the law of his own country; thus a Dutch minor, who is by the law of Belgium major, cannot dispose of his real property in Belgium without observing the precautionary measures which Belgian law requires in the case of the alienation of the heritage of minors. It will be noted that the status of the person in this case is determined by the law of his domicile, none the less that the subject of the contract is real estate (Erambert v. Clerdent, etc., Cour de Liège, 1879, Jour. viii. 87).

In Germany the ordinary rule is the same as generally upon the continent—viz. that the status of the person is determined by the law of his domicile; but by § 53 of the German Code of Procedure, a foreigner who has no capacity to sue by the law of his own country, may yet sue in Germany, if the law of that country allows natives of his age to do so.

A somewhat peculiar case is reported as decided in the Supreme Court of Austria in 1882 (Jour. xiii. p. 468). A Prussian lady attained majority, twenty-one years of age, in 1878: next year she married an Austrian, and by the Austrian law the age of majority is twenty-four. After her marriage she accepted a bill in Austria, and, on being sued for payment, pleaded that she was an Austrian, and therefore not of age. The court of first instance sustained this defence, but on appeal decree went against her, on the ground that by her marriage she could not destroy rights which she had acquired, i.e. could not relapse into minority again. M. Clunet, however, doubts the soundness of this decision. See his note in the Journal.]

REACTION OF MODERN POSITIVE LAW AGAINST THIS CUSTOMARY LAW.

§ 141. On the other hand, the more recent statutes of the European continent are tending more and more to make an exception from the rule of recognising the law of the country to which the parties belong, by recognising contracts concluded in any country as valid, if the foreigner contracting would by the laws of that country be deemed to be of full capacity.³⁶ Thus, to a certain extent, the theory of the law of the United

³⁶ Thus the Prussian Allgem. Landr. Einleitung, §§ 23 and 35. § 23 provides: "The personal attributes and powers of an individual shall be determined by the law of the jurisdiction in which he has his domicile." § 35, again, runs thus: "A foreigner, however, who makes contracts in this country, about things that are situated here, will have his capacity to contract determined by the law, which will be most favourable to the subsistence of the contracts." To this effect, too, the statute book for Zürich, § 2, subsec. 2. Saxon statute book, § 8: "The capacity of a foreigner will be determined by the law of this country, if there is a question as to his liability arising upon a contract made in this country." (Construed literally, this implies that a foreigner who is of full capacity by the law of his own

States, which originally was that of England, is making itself felt, although there is room for doubt whether the result is to declare that the lex loci actus regulates such obligations generally, or only does so to the effect of favouring obligations which are undertaken in the country of the legislator himself. Thorough-going measures of this kind, in favour of the subjects of the countries which hold this theory, have, as we think, not been fully tested so long as the execution of foreign judgments, without examination of their merits, takes place only to the limited extent, or under the many restrictions, which we find at present to be the case. If we assume an extended and a reciprocal recognition of foreign judgments, it would then frequently be an easy matter for a person who was under guardianship or curatory, to withdraw himself from that limitation upon his powers by making a journey into some neighbouring country, in which a different legal system prevailed, and so to laugh at the law of his own country. Although such a system seems feasible enough in the United States, where this manœuvre cannot be put in practice without crossing the ocean or a vast extent of desert country, the situation of affairs in Europe is quite different, as indeed will soon come to be the case in North America.

The new draft of a commercial code for Portugal has, therefore, rightly declared against such enactments.

AN INTERMEDIATE PRINCIPLE. (MOST MODERN FRENCH PRACTICE.)

§ 142. French jurisprudence has recently hit upon a via media. The view has several times been recognised that a foreigner, who by the law of France would have full capacity, cannot escape from an obligation undertaken by him in France, by an appeal to his own domestic law, his personal statute, which differs from that of France in this point, if no neglect of precautions to inform himself of the capacity of the foreigner can be charged against the other party.³⁷ country, will be treated as wanting in capacity in Saxony, if by the law of Saxony he is so wanting. See Stobbe, § 21, note 24. This is certainly peculiar.) The Swiss Federal Statute, too, which came into force on 1st January 1882, provides in its tenth article, after making capacity dependent on the law of the nationality, and drawing the line of full age at twenty, that the foreigner, who by the law of Switzerland has full capacity, will validly bind himself in Switzerland, although, by the law of his own country, he may not be clothed with full capacity. (Cf. Martin, Jour. x. p. 29.) Muheim (p. 123) declares against such obligations, except in connection with bills. In relation to capacity in the law of bills, see the General German Wechselordnung, § 84: "The capacity of a foreigner to undertake obligations by bill, is determined by the law of the State to which he belongs. But yet a foreigner who, by the law of his native country, has not this capacity, will be bound by such obligations undertaken by him in this country, in so far as, by the law of this country, he is capable of undertaking them." Substantially to the same effect, art. 2 of the "Projet d'une loi uniforme sur les lettres de change et les billets à ordre," sketched by the International Congress at Antwerp in 1885. For an application of this principle, which in our view is not at all appropriate, is § 53 of the German Civilprozessordnung; see the subject of the law of process.

³⁷ So Demolombe, droit civil, i. pp. 117, 118, and the judgments of the Cour de Paris of 1858, and the Court of Cassation of 1861, cited by Weiss, p. 546. But see, in the same sense,

We would be glad to believe that the future belongs to this theory,³⁸ which is an intermediate theory between the doctrines of the Continent of Europe and of England and America, and which, according to Lord Fraser, is in harmony with the practice of Scotland (see supra, p. 310). It does, however, on one side lead to strange results, which are highly inconvenient for countries whose frontiers are easily crossed, if a man, who in his own country is incapable, by simply crossing the frontier can attain full capacity in accordance with the lex loci actus, or, at least, will be regarded by the courts of the other country as of full capacity;³⁹ while, on the other hand, the rule "qui cum alio contrahit, vel est vel esse debet non ignarus conditionis ejus," cannot without serious results be applied to all such contracts, in which there is often no occasion to suspect a foreigner in the other party, or in which it would put too severe an obstacle upon trade, if a difficult and perhaps protracted inquiry as to the law of the country to which he belongs had to be set on foot.⁴⁰ Of course, such a provision in the law would never be called in to aid mala fides, i.e. to assist a man who actually knew that the foreigner contracting with him had not full capacity. This objection may no doubt be taken, that the question of "due care" will in practice raise many difficulties: these do not, however, seem to be insurmountable. As a matter of fact, we know that, in very many matters of daily life, e.g. in unimportant ready-money sales in a shop, any enquiry as to the capacity of the party, if he seems to be of full capacity by the rules of our law (i.e. of full age), would be looked upon as something quite unusual, while the case is otherwise in unimportant transactions on credit, or in sales of heritable property; while to contract a marriage, without precise information as to the personal legal position of the other spouses, would be thought to be gross carelessness. But it cannot be shown that there is any protection for gross carelessness or for mala fides in our rule; that mala fides which, for example, would rob a young man, who by the the judgment of the Cour de Paris of October 1883 (Jour. x. p. 291), and the Trib. Civ. Seine 1st July 1886 (Jour. xiv. p. 178), in relation to "achats faits pour les besoins usuels," if the other party "a traité sans imprudence et de bonne foi." In connection with capacity to contract by bills, see judgment of the Cour de Paris of 10th June 1879 (Jour. vi. p. 488). According to this a foreign minor who, by the law of France, would be major, cannot dispute the validity of obligations on bills undertaken by him in France as against bona fide third parties who hold the bills, and who have acted with sufficient caution. In 1883 I recommended the two following propositions for adoption by the Institute of International Law, viz. :—

"(1.) La capacité personnelle, même en matière commerciale est régie par la loi nationale de la partie.

"(2.) Toutefois, une partie (ou le successeur de celle-ci) ayant agi de bonne foi, le contrat (ou l'acte d'acquisition) serait valable quant à la capacité personnelle, selon la loi du contrat" (Annuaire vii. p. 49).

I should like to add in (2), after the words "bonne foi," the words "et sans imprudence grave."

³⁸ Bard, § 137, also declares for it.

⁴⁰ Similarly, too, Aubry et Rau, i. § 21, note 29. See, too, Brocher, Nouv. Tr. p. 104. . . . "Les tribunaux peuvent apprécier les faits et rechercher de quel côté se trouve la faute principale." law of his own country was still under age; still, however, by the categorical words of the new Swiss statute and of the Saxon code, even such mala fides receives protection.⁴¹

Laurent (ii. §§ 51 and 95) combats this theory fiercely, and he is right to this extent, that it is hardly possible to maintain it intact against the provision of article 3 of the Code civil, and that it is also impracticable for it to prevail against the customary law of the European Continent without special legislative sanction. But he is wrong in asserting that the operation of the personal statute is annulled by the theory of the French Court of Cassation, and wrong also in asserting that the law of a man's home only declares an incapacity which has a real existence in itself (see supra, as to the general principles of incapacity, p. 300). In the draft of a statute book for Belgium, prepared by himself, Laurent falls upon a device which comes very close to the theory against which he is fighting, but in one respect is less practical.⁴² The foreigner who contracts in Belgium shall, he suggests, always declare his personal law, and any incapacity which it may impose upon him, otherwise the other party contracting in good faith may demand the application of the law of Belgium. Apart altogether from the very possible case that a man should be mistaken as to his own nationality, or should not be accurately acquainted with its laws, such a professio legis in these modern times would be in marked conflict with the usages of our intercourse, and could hardly be observed.⁴³

SPECIAL INCAPACITIES. (INCAPACITY FOR CERTAIN PARTICULAR KINDS OF LEGAL TRANSACTIONS.)

§ 143. Such a modified application of the party's own law, with a view to advancing the security of commerce,⁴⁴ and not with the more selfish view of favouring the citizens of our own country, would practically also put an end to a difficult special controversy, the controversy, namely,

⁴³ Such a compulsitor would be necessarily imposed, as Laurent proposes, in the case of the execution of notarial deeds.

whether we must pronounce a legal transaction not to be binding, by reason of some special incapacity which exists according to the foreign personal statute; by reason, that is to say, of a rule of law which leaves the person in general with full legal capacity, and only declares him or her to be incapable of undertaking certain particular obligations, e.g. obligations by bills, loans of money (S. Cum Macedonianum), and suretyships (S. Cum Velleianum).

International recognition of such special incapacities, by reason of rules of law that are quite special, indisputably implies a very serious danger to commerce. In these cases there is, as a rule, a total absence of any point on which the other party may rely for warning and information.⁴⁵ At this point, too, the opinions of those who in other respects declare for the application of the law of the foreigner's own country, begin to diverge.⁴⁶ My belief is that there is no sufficient evidence of any general law of custom in the matter of these special incapacities, by which incapacity, existing in virtue of the law of the domicile or nationality, can be made generally available.⁴⁷ I am, however, of the opinion that the judge of the foreigner's own country must take the incapacity as the basis of his judgment, even against a different rule of law prevailing at the locus actus, and even where the other contracting party can show absolute bona fides; thus, I fear, these special incapacities, the numbers of which have, no doubt, been much thinned by modern legislation, must give occasion for a variety of conflicts of law. Such conflicts would cease, if the principle we have recommended were adopted. In a foreign country it would, as a rule, be possible to be ignorant of the special incapacities of our law, without giving any ground for a charge of remissness, and thus the judge of the country to which the defender in the action belonged, might reach the same result as the judge of the country in which the transaction was concluded, or was to be carried out.⁴⁸

⁴⁵ Whereas the grounds of general incapacity (no doubt with some modifications) are recognised in all civilised countries, just because they are more natural in their character, and whereas the persons who are generally recognised as subject to this incapacity, do not, as a rule, have in fact the assets of their property ready to hand, so that the other party to the contract is directly put upon his enquiry, the case is often exactly the reverse with the special incapacities, which are frequently quite arbitrary.

The exception, now generally recognised, by which the dole of the incapacitated person renders him liable to the other contracting party in damages or reparation, implies a certain approximation to this general principle. Even in the days of the Roman law, the minor who dishonestly gave himself out as of full age, was refused restitution. In his own country, a man can only practise a deceit of that kind by fraudulently claiming to be older than he is, or stating that he has obtained the venia ætatis. Abroad, however, he may do it without making any false statement as to his age, but either by asserting that by the law of his own country the age which he admits constitutes majority, or by dishonestly concealing what his own law is, under circumstances which cast on him an obligation to disclose it.⁴⁹ If we are a little less strict in insisting on all the conditions of actual fraud, and content ourselves with saddling the foreigner who is under an incapacity with the duty of disclosing it, when the other party is obviously in error as to the true state of affairs, the practical result will not differ very markedly from the principle of legislation which we have recommended.⁵⁰

SUBSEQUENT CHANGE OF THE PERSONAL LAW.

§ 144. There is, lastly, a question to which the authorities give different answers, viz. whether in the cases we have discussed the appeal is to the law of the State or domicile to which the person belongs at the time of the act in question, or to that to which he belonged at the time of his birth. The majority of writers who examine this speciality pronounce in favour of the former,⁵¹ and undoubtedly they are right. Laws which deal with capacity have for their object the permanent protection of the person, and apply, therefore, to those persons only who belong permanently to the State. If the connection of the person with the State has ceased upon his changing his residence into another country, the time has come for that protective care to cease. The person then stands under the protection of the law of his new home.

Although some authors, like Merlin,⁵² have enunciated doubts on the subject, and others, like Bouhier,⁵³ following the lead of Froland,⁵⁴ have pronounced in favour of the opposite rule, admitting, however, important exceptions, this difference of opinion is, upon a closer examination of the arguments of these authors, accounted for in this way. In the first place, they have in their minds the rules of law which concern legal capacity or status in the true sense, and again, in virtue of a general usage applicable to an institute of law, which takes a prominent place in this connection, viz. nobility, the nobleman, as we shall see subsequently, retains as a rule the rights of his rank on emigration to another country. In the second place, these writers drag into the discussion rules of law which have no concern with capacity to act, but deal with the rights of third parties in the whole of an aggregate of property, and the consequent want of dispositive power in the proprietor thereof; e.g. the rules which regulate a husband's rights over his wife's estate. Lastly, however, they think it unreasonable that any one, who has already attained majority by his own law, should become a minor again, in obedience to the law of a new domicile, if by it a more advanced age is required to constitute majority. This inference, however, as we shall see later, is removed by another consideration.

⁴⁹ In support of this view, see Laurent, ii. §§ 94, 95; Picard, Jour. viii. 485, and the Belgian practice (cf. C. de Liège 1872); Weiss, p. 547.

⁵⁰ Many authors (as Holzschuber, i. p. 58) confine the operation of the personal statute to conflicts of different provincial systems. After what has already been said (§ 35), this view needs no special refutation; no more does the theory (Kori, iii. p. 174) that the lex domicilii, as regards questions of capacity, only rules the property which may be situated in that country. It rests upon an inadmissible confusion of the merits of the judicial sentence with the accidental possibility of carrying it into execution.

Of course, a legal transaction once well concluded will not become invalid by the subsequent emergence of some incapacity; will not become so, for instance, by reason of the obligant becoming the citizen of some State, by the law of which he is incapacitated.⁵⁵ But just as little will a legal transaction, which is invalid because the pretended obligant is under legal incapacity, become valid by this person becoming the citizen of some other State, by the law of which he would have been of full capacity.⁵⁶

B. SPECIAL QUESTIONS, TOUCHING THE CAPACITY TO HAVE RIGHTS (Status).
SLAVERY, CIVIL DEATH, BONDAGE.

§ 145. It may be considered as admitted by all the authorities, that any one who is in his domicile a slave, is recognised as a free man so long as he is in a country which does not recognise slavery.¹ The question, as to whether a man is a slave or free, coincides with the question whether he is capable of any legal rights or not, and the answer immediately follows from what we have said as to the legal rules regulating that capacity. We may also refer to the consideration which is in the view of many persons, viz. that slavery must be regarded, in a country which does not recognise it, as a condition totally at variance with the laws which are laid down for the government of that country.² It seems a more doubtful question whether one who has become free will become once more a slave if he shall return to his domicile. As we cannot proceed upon any such hypothesis as that the slave by his stay in the other State acquires another personal status,³ we arrive at the conclusion which is recognised in American practice, that a person returning home in this way is again to be held to be a slave there if his stay in the other State has been merely temporary.⁴ In any case the slave State would refuse to see any ground for freedom in the merely temporary stay in another country, while the slave could not appeal to the protection of the law of the free State, since he does not belong to it. It is otherwise if the slave acquires a domicile in the foreign State, and thereby becomes attached to that State. In such a case, the principle of free right of emigration recognised by public law requires an international recognition of the slave's release, to the same extent as the acquisition of a new citizenship shall be recognised. Third States must therefore recognise it absolutely;⁵ the principles laid down in § 62 will determine whether the State in which he was formerly a slave will recognise it.⁶ The jurisprudence of the United States went further than this at the time at which slavery still existed in some of the States. Although it was an admitted rule that runaway slaves could be followed into non-slave-holding States, it was equally well recognised that if a slave, with his master's leave,⁷ lived for a considerable time in one of the free States, and acquired citizenship there, his freedom must subsequently be recognised even in the slave State.⁸

⁵⁵ But see the case referred to in note F, supra, p. 312.

¹ Mornacius, ad L. 20, D. 4-6, ex quibus causis; J. Voet, Comment. in Dig., l. 5, § 3; and so early as 1315, an ordinance of Louis X. of the 2nd July. See Massé, ii. pp. 83, 84. It was, however, permitted by some other older French edicts that slaves might be temporarily brought to France from French colonies.—Massé. See, too, Grönewegen ad Inst. l. 1, § 8, No. 3; Story, § 96; Wächter, ii. p. 172; Savigny, § 349 and § 365; Guthrie, pp. 80 and 168; Stobbe, § 30, note 11. See in Halleck-Baker, i. p. 202, an interesting historical exposition of the English decisions for centuries on this subject. See, too, Laferrière, "Histoire des principes de la révolution Française," p. 138. The Decree of 28th September 1791, art. i., "Tout individu est libre aussitôt qu'il est entre en France," which did not, however, put an end to slavery in the French colonies, was a mere repetition of a rule which had been recognised since the 16th century. § 198 of the Preuss. Allgem. Landr. ii. 5, which secured to foreigners their rights over slaves whom they brought with them, was repealed by a special law of 9th March 1857.

Many writers justify the freedom of slaves in States which do not recognise slavery, by the proposition that our courts and our officials generally could not recognise rules and institutes of law, which are at variance with public law, and with the public morality of our State. This proposition goes too far, and leads to incorrect results (see § 36 supra). If the slave is living in a slave State, he does not become free by a declaration of our courts that he is free, and the existence of slavery in full measure in another country must be recognised as a fact even by our courts, if they desire to pronounce judgments that shall not be in contradiction of facts. If then the validity of a legal transaction is in question, because an individual is by the law of his own country looked upon as a slave, the legal rules of the place, in which the individual was really resident at the time when he undertook the obligation, will rule.⁹ For it was at this moment that the will of the contracting parties was directed to the origination of the transaction in question, and no effect can be produced on the validity or invalidity of the declaration of intention, which then took place, by the circumstance that the transaction was subsequently brought up for comment in the court of another country, or became of some operation in another country, putting out of view the case of an express or implied ratification subsequently being validly made in some other country. In any other view the judge must assume the validity of his own legal system all the world over, and intercourse with foreign countries would hardly be possible. Another result is that a man, who, by the laws of his actual domicile, has no legal personality, will be unable, so long as he lives there, to exercise any rights in our country, or to make any effectual declaration of intention, it may be, for instance, by means of letters. This result may also be justified on grounds of expediency. If a person, who in another country is ranked as a slave, could make declarations of intention there by which any property he happened to have in this country could be affected, the peculiar relation in which he is placed might be used for oppressions and extortions, which should have their first effect in our country. It will be a sounder course to set up a cura absentis, if we find in this country any property belonging to the subjects of another State, who are under some incapacity in their own country.¹⁰ In so far as regards slavery our discussion is of little value at the present day, but it must also be applicable to civil death, and in this connection it may be more useful.

⁹ Schmid (p. 40) takes a different view. He desires that our courts should treat the declarations of a slave emitted in a slave State as of legal effect. But even the jurisprudence of Rome is against this; it is familiar that the legal acts of a Roman citizen, who had fallen into the power of the enemy, were no longer looked on as valid. Schmid's view would perhaps be right, if the whole legal system of a State, in which slavery is recognised, could not be recognised by us as a legal system at all. Cf. L. 19, pr. §§ 1-3, D. de postliminio, 49, 15. Against Schmid, see in particular the more exact exposition by Muheim, § 14, c. pp. 110, 111.

¹⁰ In this way, no doubt, the property of a slave which happens to be in this country may be used to buy his freedom. By that means Schmid's objections, in which it may be thought there is some practical force, are got rid of.

Whatever is true of slavery, may be assumed to be true of bondage.

OTHER RESTRICTIONS ON CAPACITY: BY REASON OF A CRIMINAL SENTENCE:
BY REASON OF RELIGIOUS PROFESSION.

§ 146. The legal systems of the present day show various examples of restrictions on legal capacity or status, by reason of a criminal sentence. The most thorough-going of these restrictions is that of civil death,¹¹ but there is no doubt that this has now been recognised as an institution that may be rejected, and it is therefore by degrees disappearing from all legal systems. In the next place, it is undoubtedly recognised that a limitation of legal capacity or status, which is unknown to our law, on that account cannot, and must not, have any operation in this country. If a man in country A is declared incapable of driving some trade, that cannot be kept up against him in country B, where an incapacity of that character is altogether unknown.¹² If an incapacity of the same character does exist in country B also, the question comes to be whether the conditions of fact, which the law of country B requires, are present in the case on hand.¹³ The question whether incapacity, which rests upon a criminal sentence,¹⁴ e.g. incapacity to take an oath, or to hold a curatory, shall receive effect in another country, if such an incapacity is familiar there also as the result of a judicial sentence, is more difficult to answer. To give effect to such a declaration of incapacity would simply be a partial execution of a foreign criminal sentence, but the penalties of wrong-doing cannot be carried out by our legal system, unless it is persuaded by means of its own procedure of the justice of the punishment, and accordingly it will be more correct to answer the question, which we have put, in the negative. The case may certainly occur that a person, who undoubtedly would have to be regarded in this country as unworthy to exercise some right conceded to honourable men only, on account of some crime which he has committed, may yet

¹¹ See on this subject especially, Savigny, system v. p. 151.

¹² On the other hand, if the incapacity in question exists in our State only, and not in another State, our courts cannot refuse the persons, who are by our law declared to be incapacitated, the right in question in connection with any legal relations that may belong to that other State. This is properly recognised by the judgment of the French Court of Cassation, of 7th June 1806 and 26th January 1807, to the effect that the sentence of civil death pronounced in France upon the emigrés left them all their property abroad (cf. Weiss, p. 621). Enquiry must be made as to what laws rule the legal relation in question in other respects.

¹⁴ In so far as a diminution of legal capacity is attached, not to any criminal sentence, but to a fact, this fact has always the same effect, which the law, which in other respects furnishes the rule for determination and regulation of the legal relation in question, assigns to it. Cf. Muheim, p. 112.

make claim to exercise that right, because it is the sentence of a foreign court, and not of a court of this country, that has deprived him of it. There is only one means of meeting this difficulty, unless we are at once to have recourse to the serious expedient of recognising unconditionally the sentence of foreign criminal courts. That means has been adopted by the German legal system, as it formerly was by the Prussian system, with good reason, but only in so far as its own subjects are concerned.¹⁵ It is, that is to say, recognised as possible, where a sentence has been passed in a foreign country, that a new criminal process should be started with no other object in view but this, to wipe out the rights of the convict as an honourable citizen, or some of them. Such a provision as this has, as a mere threat, a far-reaching effect: if no claim is made to exercise the rights and privileges in question, the practical course will be to waive the institution of a process for the object we have specified. Besides that foreigners will, as a general rule, make no claim to exercise the rights of honourable citizens, e.g. the political franchise. The only class of difficulties which arises is that description which springs from the fact that a foreigner has been declared in a foreign country incapable of taking an oath,¹⁶ on account of some delict, which by our law must or may be visited with a like penalty. As a matter of legislation, it seems to be sound to leave the discretion of the judge to determine this question,¹⁷ viz. whether sufficient credit can be given to the foreign sentence, e.g. regard being had to the fact whether it is or is not disputed by the foreigner who is concerned, and regard also being had to the likeness between the judicial arrangements and the laws of our own and of the foreign State in question. Some authors propose to attach a general international recognition to a sentence which destroys or limits the honour or legal capacity of a person pronounced by a judge of his own country (or, according to older notions, of his own domicile). In so doing, however, they either forget the peculiar nature of a criminal sentence, or, in a way which is inadmissible, regard the status of a person as something belonging to him by nature, a character stamped upon him by his own law.¹⁸

(Baldus, however, makes an exception of the case, where the poena has to do merely with an actus extrinsecus, e.g. the summons to appear in court, and Boubier gives his judgment with this qualification, that the infamy which arises from a criminal sentence is generally recognised only if it is in accord with the jus commune.) Brocher in recent times takes this view; Rev. iii. p. 435; Weiss, p. 621. On the other hand, see P. Voet, iv. 3, No. 18, 19; and J. Voet, de stat. § 7, as also, among modern authors, Fiore, § 50 ad fin.; Wharton, § 108 ad fin. "As a general rule, it is fully settled that penal laws have no extra-territorial effect" Aubry et Rau, § 31, note 40, and specially, too, Bard, § 135.

The special question, whether a restitution by the sovereign of all rights taken away by a sentence of infamy, by virtue of the prerogative of mercy, must also be respected in another country,¹⁹ depends on the conditions under which a pardon bestowed in one country is to be recognised in another.

The question, then, can only be completely disposed of in connection with criminal law. A pardon bestowed by the State which is alone or primarily, according to international principles, competent to inflict punishment, must be recognised by other countries also. In any case, no further limitations upon the good repute of a person can be founded upon a sentence passed upon him in a foreign country, which has been abrogated by the pardon.

It needs no discussion to show that limitations of status on the ground of religious profession have no extra-territorial operation. In this connection, however, we see very clearly that it is an entirely false principle to set capacity to have rights (status) and capacity to act on the same footing.²⁰ The decision in any particular case is at once supplied in this subject, by remembering that only those laws which regulate the legal relation in question in other respects, have anything to do with the determination of this question. Thus, if a man in his own country is declared incapable of succession, because he has given up some particular religious belief, he may still take as heir an estate in a country in which religious beliefs have no bearing upon the right of succession.²¹

ENTRY INTO A RELIGIOUS ORDER.

§ 147. Special consideration may well be given to that partial legal incapacity which is produced by the law of the Catholic Church, and also by the law of some States, by entering a religious order. Strict logic seems to require that the legal system of a country, in which religious vows have no longer any civil effect, should refuse to attribute any such effect to legal incapacity of this kind, even although it does exist according to the law of the country to which the individual belongs. The practical outcome of this would be that a monk, who is incapable of taking succession by the laws of his own State, could be the heir of a person who belongs to another State, in which the incapacity has no longer any effect in civil matters. There is, however, something to be said for the view, that a man who has taken the votum

²¹ See Weiss, p. 622. The application of the lex fori—because, forsooth, we are here concerned with coercitive laws—leads to results that are quite unreasonable.

paupertatis, has thereby renounced for himself all rights of succession.²² The question whether the order to which he belongs takes his place, is a question which must depend on the law which in other respects regulates the succession in the particular case, generally, therefore, the law of the country of the deceased. The outcome of the opposite view²³ is to enrich either the foreign monastery, or it may be the foreign fisk, at the expense of the relations of the deceased, who belong to the same country as he belonged to. The former result, too, would take place against the desire of the system of law to which the monk or nun and the monastery themselves belonged. It is by the canon law that property, which has truly passed to the monk or nun, becomes in turn the property of the religious house, in countries where the vow is recognised as having a civil effect.²⁴ It is, however, beyond doubt sound law to regard as null the marriage of a monk who belongs to another country, and by whose personal law his vows have a recognised effect quoad civilia,²⁵ and not to permit it to take place before the officials of another country who are charged with the care of matters of status: for it is the personal statute of the husband which primarily furnishes the rule for marriage and the marriage ceremony. There is certainly no doubt that, so soon as the monk is naturalised in a country which does not regard such vows as binding, he reacquires the capacity of marrying.²⁶ With regard to the legal capacity of a corporation or juristic person we may refer to §§ 104-107 supra.²⁷

²² Savigny, § 365; Guthrie, p. 167, note (a), is somewhat to the same effect. That may, too, be asserted for the case of a person entering a monastery in a foreign country, provided that the vow of poverty has a compulsory force there.

²³ See Story, § 104; Wharton, § 107; Weiss, p. 622.

²⁵ To this effect a decision of the Cour de Paris on 13th June 1814 (cf. Brocher ut cit.), which has led to much comment.

The courts of France have held the marriage of a Catholic priest, celebrated in London according to English forms, null. Rouet v. Rouet, Trib. Civ. de la Seine, 1886. Jour. xiv. p. 66.]

²⁷ As regards religious corporations, see Esperson, Jour. vii. p. 338. He attributes extra-territorial effect to an incapacity created by the loi nationale. Savigny (ut cit.), on the other hand, applies the lex fori. But can it be said that Spanish monasteries have no rights of property in land in Spain, because German courts will not recognise it? Stobbe (§ 30, note 20), who makes the acquisition of real property dependent on the lex rei sitæ, is more correct. See Wharton, § 107, note. I am clearly of opinion, with him, that the incapacity of a French Jesuit to give instruction, which has its origin in the French law of 1880, cannot be applied to him in America.

PRIVILEGES OF RANK. NOBILITY.

§ 148. Special privileges of rank or position are determined, not by the lex domicilii of the person concerned, but by the law of the State to which the legal relation which may be in question otherwise belongs.²⁸ (For the foundation of this rule, see supra, § 137.) The only doubt on the subject seems to arise in the case of the privileges attaching to what is called nobility.

Some authors hold the privileges of nobility as confined strictly to the territory in which they have their origin, either by descent or by grant:²⁹ others make a distinction between nobility which is enjoyed by virtue of descent and new nobility conferred by the sovereign, recognising the former only as universally valid.³⁰

Lastly, a large number of eminent authors consider nobility as valid everywhere, whether it rests on descent or on grant, and make no exception from the rule unless the sovereign should grant nobility to one who is not his subject.³¹

In fact, as Savigny remarks (§ 365; Guthrie, p. 168), no general rule can be laid down. It depends upon the import of the rules of law establishing the privileges of nobility whether these privileges are to be conceded to native nobles only, or to foreigners also. Where the only consequences of these rules is to confer distinguishing marks of honour, then, by a general international usage, which certainly cannot be disputed nowadays,³² these are conceded to foreign nobles also.³³ The use of titles of nobility, which a man has a legal right to bear by the law of his personal status, is recognised without the necessity of any special licence, if the foreigner does not enter the community of the State, and without any doubt is recognised, if he makes only a temporary stay there. Other special rights, on the other hand, can only be conceded to native nobility.³⁴

³⁴ Thöl, § 78, note 6: "He who gets his nobility from us has such and such rights; he who gets it from a foreign power has such and such rights; the latter has not in our country the rights called nobility." There is no substantial difference between what is said in the text and Beseler's view (i. § 39, note 6), if he assigns a merely social import to the privileges of nobility in a foreign country, and not a legal significance. The latter expression, however, is not a happy one. We cannot well forbid a foreign nobleman to use his style and title as a nobleman in this country.

We cannot carry the distinction between hereditary and created nobility with us in this theory, and there is no theoretical ground for its adoption: one as well as the other rests on the laws of the State.³⁵ As far as Germany is concerned, it may be noted that patents of nobility which have existed since the days of the earlier empire, or which were conferred by the sovereign authority of the empire before 6th August 1806, are recognised in all German States, not merely from reasons of international law, but because they had been recognised by the older sovereign authority of these countries.

When a man passes over into the community or citizenship of another State, nobility which has been conferred on him in his former domicile will be regarded as tacitly conceded to him in his new home;³⁶ but if nobility is not recognised in this new country, it is, on the grounds already adduced (supra, note 33), lost.^{37 38} The same principles must necessarily rule, and as a matter of fact do rule, the possession and the wearing of orders³⁹ and decorations.

A criminal sentence by which nobility or the right to orders and decorations is withdrawn, can make no claim to extra-territorial effect, unless it has been pronounced by the country to which the criminal belongs, or deals with orders which belong to the country of the court that pronounces the sentence.

³⁹ On decorations, see Lehr's paper in Jour. xiv. pp. 297-302. The foreigner requires no permission from the Government of his domicile to wear orders. But he becomes amenable to the criminal law of that place if he wears orders to which he has no right. Trib. corr. Corbeil, Jour. xiv. p. 180.

C. SPECIAL QUESTIONS TOUCHING CAPACITY TO ACT.

MINORITY (venia ætatis): CHANGE OF NATIONALITY.

§ 149. We have already shown why this incapacity to act must, according to the law of the Continent of Europe, be as a rule determined by the personal statute of the party concerned.¹ Logic requires that the personal statute of a minor shall also determine whether, and, if so, what particular acts of disposition *inter vivos*² may, as an exception, be undertaken by minors.³ It is therefore unnecessary to do more than to notice some specialities, with regard to which doubt may arise.

(1.) By systems of territorial law, it is in the power of the sovereign⁴

Voet seems to hesitate; cf. Comm. 4.1, § 29, with 4.4, § 8; Gand, Nos. 482, 483, proposes that the lex rei sitæ should rule in cases as to the disposition of real property. On the whole of this subject, however, he proceeds very arbitrarily, and (506) lays down the proposition that the foreigner who contracts in France subjects himself, in so far as his capacity to act is concerned, to the laws of France. It is, however, obvious, that it cannot be in the power of any person to determine his own legal capacity as he will. Former English and American practice, on the other hand—probably on the grounds of expediency, which have already been refuted—pronounced for the lex loci contractus (Story, § 82, § 103, Wharton, § 112). Burge, i. p. 125, approves of this, and allows the lex rei sitæ to rule in questions as to the disposal of real property, because, by his view, it would encroach upon the sovereign rights of the individual States if the lex loci contractus were taken as the rule for these cases also (p. 120). According to Burge, i. p. 133, the lex loci contractus is to decide if the person is by it a minor, but is by the law of his domicile of full age. “For it would not be reasonable that two different laws should be applied to one and the same contract,” which is Burge’s reason, must be rejected as a petitio principii. Burge, like many other authors, throws together the rules of law on this subject, and those which deal with the capacity to execute testaments. Grotius, de J. B. ii. c. 11, § 2, in the same way makes the lex loci contractus rule. He argues from the position that the foreigner becomes a subditus temporarius at the seat of the contract. Wharton proposes that where capacity to act exists in any person by virtue of the law of his own country, it should be recognised everywhere, on the same grounds as I have already adduced, to which, too, Schmid has given in his adherence. Among the reasons of expediency which in his view support the lex loci actus in other cases, Wharton dwells specially on the prejudice which one, who is minor by the law of his own country, may suffer, if it is made impossible for him to trade in all other countries. But this prejudice can only arise if the minor emigrates for good, and then he may, with consent of the supreme curatorial authority, domicile himself in the foreign country. In the year 1873, the Russian Senate at Warsaw determined that the question whether a person is to be regarded as a minor must, even in the case of real property situated in Russian Poland, be determined by the personal statute of the foreigner concerned, and that too, even in the case where by Russian law he would be of full age. Jour. i. p. 48.

² We have nothing to do here with mortis causa deeds. Cf. supra, § 136, note.

³ See supra, § 134, on the distinction drawn by Wächter between the attributes of a person and their operation.

to confer the rights of majority upon a minor either in full or in part. This grant of majority is made in virtue of the laws of that country, although it requires a special act of the authority of the State, and it has therefore the force of law; such a case, therefore, is to be regarded in the same light as if the lex domicilii appointed an earlier age as the initial age of majority for all its subjects.⁵ From this it follows that majority can be conferred by the sovereign on none but his own subjects.⁶

(2.) The capacity of a person to act is settled, as we have seen, by the laws that are recognised at the place of the domicile which that person had at the time of the transaction which is in question. If, then, one who is already major acquires nationality in a country where a more advanced age than that required by his own country is the age of majority, it seems that he must again become minor. Some authors have expressly drawn this conclusion.⁷ Besides those who regard majority once attained as persistent in conformity with the general principle assumed by them, to the effect that legal capacity is determined by the original personal law and cannot be altered, many who hold an opposite view of the general principle make an exception in this case, either on grounds of expediency,⁸ which obviously recommend such an exception, or because they regard the majority conferred by the country of the first domicile as a vested right, not to be lost by any subsequent change of domicile.⁹

Apart from considerations of expediency, to which no force can be given, if an accurate legal view contradicts their conclusions, we must recognise that, as we saw before, and as even Savigny elsewhere admits, the theory of vested rights must be thrown out of the system of international law, since its justification is rested on a circle of reasoning. This capacity to act, besides, does not belong to the category of vested rights in the ordinary sense.¹⁰

Savigny thinks that his view receives special confirmation by comparing it with the case of venia ætatis, acquired specially at the place of the earlier domicile. The consequences of such a grant by the sovereign cannot, he says, be afterwards withdrawn, and it would be unnatural and arbitrary to attribute less force to the majority established by the law of the earlier domicile than to that established by grant. This last argument rests also upon a circle of reasoning. The special grant of the rights of majority is not any more, or in any higher sense, a vested right, than the statutory majority. If the latter were not recognised at the seat of the new domicile, neither would the venia ætatis be recognised. I believe, however, that I may confess I have arrived at the same result¹¹ on strictly legal grounds. It is necessary that a person should have, in order to an independent and voluntary acquisition of a domicile, capacity to act, and that both by the law of the domicile which he has and by that of the country to which he intends to remove; the former, that he may be able to undo the tie which binds him to his native country; the latter, that he may be in a position to enter into the new allegiance. The authority of the State which permits one who is minor by her laws, to establish his domicile independently in her territory, silently recognises the capacity of this person to act; she silently concedes the rights of majority, if she permits any one who is not yet major by her laws to establish his abode independently in her territory. To justify this exception, there is no need to appeal to the considerations of expediency which we have mentioned; they are quite inadmissible as arguments.¹²

⁵ Hert, iv. § 11; Hommel Rhaps, vol. ii. obs. 409; Burgundus, i. 12. The Royal Chancellory of Hanover at Celle, on 17th January 1820, removed a guardian because of a venia ætatis granted in another country (Bülow and Hagemann, Discussions, vol. vii. No. 80, p. 244). ⁸ Boullenois, ii. p. 12.

On the other hand, however, we must hold that a person who is still a minor by the law of the domicile which he has hitherto enjoyed, becomes major at once upon acquiring citizenship in another State, if he is of the age which it requires as a condition of majority. This may have practical results in the case of a girl, not of full age, marrying a foreigner

by the laws of whose State the wife is at once recognised as of full age.^{13 14}

Of course, the acts which the person has done when he was, according to the law of his original country, of full age, must remain legal and valid acts, even although by the law of his new country he should again become minor (cf. Brocher, Nouv. Tr. ut cit.).

CURATORY OF WOMEN.

§ 150. According to the principles which we have already laid down (supra, § 135), we have to deal with a real incapacity to act (which must be treated as a personal law, and so must be regulated by the lex domicilii or nationality, as the case may be), in those cases in which a woman needs, in order to do legal acts, the consent of some one else who may, if he likes, refuse his consent; although it may be that the necessary consent can be given by a competent court.¹⁵ If the man who supplements her capacity—her guardian or curator—only gives her advice, or, if the woman may choose any other guardian she pleases in place of one who refuses his consent, until she finds one whose will coincides with her own, then we have to do with a mere form, which may perhaps protect her from hasty acts, and this must be ruled by the maxim "locus regit actum." It is possible, too, that there are only certain special classes of legal transactions, in which the woman requires the consent of her curator or of her husband: in such cases, the principles which we assume as regulative of these special incapacities must give the rule.

The differences of opinion that prevail as to whether the necessity of the assistance of a curator is to be determined by the law of the domicile of the woman, or by the lex loci contractus, are explained by the varieties of such curatory corresponding to the categories given above; these were in the contemplation of the authors who treat of the subject, and from them they constructed a general rule.¹⁶ In more modern times such curatory

¹³ Cf. v. Wächter, ii. p. 187; Schmid, p. 84; Stobbe, § 30, note 29.

exists only in the case of married women, whose curator is their husband (Gerber, §§ 245, 246), and it has the effect of making the women altogether or partly incapable of acting.¹⁷ If the co-operation of a curator is required by the law of the place of the contract, but is not required by the woman's personal statute, then a contract concluded without such co-operation is not invalid for this reason, that the rule "locus regit actum" makes the observance of the forms required at the place of the contract, as well as other forms, optional to the parties; but still, if the forms of the domicile of the parties, and not those of the place of the contract, are observed, there must, as in all such cases, be circumstances to show the intention of the woman to enter upon a binding contract.

Lastly, if the curatory is a rule of process, the judge would sist process until a curator is appointed, in accordance with the law of the court.¹⁸

It is obvious that in so far as a wife, by the law of her nationality, requires no consent from her husband to carry on a suit, she cannot be required to produce any such consent, when she is carrying on a suit in another country, although the law of the court in which the process is dependent needs such a consent for wives who belong to that country.¹⁹ of a curator is a mere formality attaching to the legal act—Ricci, p. 537; Witzendorf, de statutis civitatum provincialium, xx. No. 2; Alderanus Mascardus, concl. 6, No. 111. In modern times Beseler, § 134, and a judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Kiel, on 9th September 1863 (Seuffert, 17, No. 1), support the theory that curatory of women (except in cases in which the wife as such needs the consent of her husband) is a mere matter of form. Wächter, ii. p. 180, although he considers that to require the advice or consent of a curator is to limit the capacity of acting (note 302), reaches the result, that we must determine the capacity of women according to our own law, if they deal in our country: this view springs from the distinction between the legal qualities of a person and their operation, to which we have referred. On the other hand, see Savigny, § 362; Guthrie, p. 151, who purposes apparently to apply the lex domicilii everywhere. On these different views, see Stobbe, § 30, note 30, whose own opinion is merely hypothetical.

¹⁹ In connection with the law of England, see § 11 of 33 and 34 Vict. c. 93; see, also, Code civ. § 215; Clunet, Jour. vii. p. 186.

If by the married woman's own law, or personal statute, a judicial authority is required, this can only be given by the court of her own country, and cannot be given by the court where the action depends.²⁰

CURATORY BY REASON OF WEAKNESS OF MIND.

§ 151. The incapacity of persons who are weak in mind is a natural fact which, as such, must be recognised all the world over. The special processes introduced by modern legal systems for the appointment of curators, have these objects only—first, to prove the mental weakness which constitutes the incapacity, and to a certain extent to raise a presumption, on which the public may rely; and, secondly, to give the curator, who is to be appointed, authority to act in name of the afflicted person.

No doubt, in general, we may be satisfied if the State which is concerned with the permanent protection of the person has adopted such measures on his behalf.

If, then, the competent officials of a man's own country have put him under curatory, the appointment will prima facie be recognised abroad, and the curator will be regarded as entitled to represent him.²¹ But, on the one hand, in view of the difficulty of defining the degree of mental weakness, which will afford a reasonable ground for the appointment of a curator, it is possible that we may recognise theories, which differ considerably from those held in other countries. In such a case it would be a palpable infraction of jus publicum, and perhaps also an offence against public morality, if we were to exclude from the enjoyment of his property, and to disable in the conduct of his business, a person who had been in another country, on grounds which we should pronounce insufficient, pronounced to be of unsound mind. At the same time, too, third parties might suffer serious prejudice if the deliverance of the foreign judge were unreservedly recognised, inasmuch as they, in accordance with the views that prevail in our country, might regard him as fully compos mentis. It must therefore, in the first place, be open to our officials to refuse effect to possible demands to be made upon them by the foreign officials, if it is obvious that our legal theories would not have justified the institution of a curatory, although in doubt effect will be given to the decree of the courts of the country to which the incapax belongs:²² in the next place, those who have contracted with him must be allowed to lead proof to that effect, and in so far as the deliverances of the foreign court are not officially intimated in our country, we shall not be in a position to say that there is any presumption for them to overcome.

²⁰ So, too, Clunet ut cit.

Again, no measures of constraint can be taken against any person, even if he belongs to another country, within our territory, except such as are prescribed by our law. Such measures are part of the jus publicum. For instance, a foreigner can only be taken by force to a lunatic asylum, if our laws permit this.²³

CURATORY BY REASON OF PRODIGALITY.

§ 152. The incapacity of acting imposed on those persons, who, for instance, are placed under curatory according to the common law of Rome on account of prodigality (or, according to the language of French jurisprudence, are effected by an interdiction), is not, of course, like mental incapacity, a natural fact. The judicial decree, however, which proclaims such an incapacity, prescribes, without doubt, a permanent protective care for the prodigal, and receives effect all over the world in accordance with the laws of the country to which he belongs. This view has been adopted by authors on the continent of Europe almost without an exception.²⁴

It has, no doubt, been objected that interdiction is really a police regulation, although the decree is pronounced by the courts, and accordingly must be limited in its operation to the territory to which the person placed under curatory belongs.²⁵ But it is a police regulation in no other sense than any other kind of guardianship is so. There is no ground for distinction in this respect in the fact that it is only found in isolated cases, while guardianship on account of minority is a thing that occurs more frequently.

The contention that interdiction, resting, as it does, upon the sentence of a foreign judge, can only receive effect under the same conditions as are ²² The practice of England and the United States is practically to the same effect. Wharton, § 122, note 5: "A decree of lunacy, when entered by a foreign court, is from the nature of things open to impeachment for want of jurisdiction, for fraud or for gross irregularity in the procedure. See, too, Pigott, pp. 296-299, and the statute 16 & 17 Vict. c. 70, § 45.

²³ See below, under the head of curatory.

No. 7; Burgundus, iii. 12; Rodenburg, ii. 1, § 4; Huber, § 12 (vouching for the practice on this point); P. Voet, iv. 3, No. 17; Abraham a Wesel, ad Nov. Const. Ultraj. art. 13, No. 26; Casaregis, disc. 43, No. 16; Hommel Rhaps. vol. ii. obs. 409, No. 3; Nic. Everhardi, jun., Cons. vol. ii. In particular, the interdiction of a foreigner set up by the officials of his own country is recognised by French law so as to affect property situated in France. See, too, Laurent ut cit., and the judgment of the Court of Ghent cited by him, of date 26th March 1847.

required for the application of a foreign decree, is more plausible.²⁶ But it is no act of contentious jurisdiction to place a person under curatory, although it may be that in some countries, in order to give the judicial cognition more completeness, and to ensure the person against arbitrary and groundless attempts upon his liberty, the curatory is issued under the form of a litigious proceeding between different parties, as is required by the law of France.²⁷

What the judge here adjudicates upon is not a relation of private law between different individuals; he has simply to pronounce a protective order for the interest of that person who is about to be placed under curatory, in which, no doubt, others may be interested, and with reference to which they may be entitled to make suggestions.²⁸

The fact that extravagant expenditure is frequently a sign of incipient mental disease, is an argument for the universal recognition of a declarator of prodigality.

A curatory, even if it be established by the courts of the country to which the person belongs, can never be recognised in another country where such a form of guardianship, i.e. on account of prodigality, is unknown. To give effect to the requisitions of the court which has made the appointment, or to recognise the curator in any transaction which may be about to be undertaken there, would be an invasion of the law of the land as to personal freedom, or the security of property and possession, as the case might be. Thus far, but only thus far, is Wharton right when (p. 122) he refuses any extra-territorial effect to a declarator of prodigality within the territory of the common law of the United States. But if a person, who has been placed under curatory on account of prodigality, emigrates to a country in which such curatories are unknown, the question whether he has recovered full capacity by this emigration, will depend upon the answer that is to be given to the preliminary enquiry, viz. whether, by the law of the State to which the emigrant has hitherto belonged, the naturalisation which has taken place in the other country must be recognised. If we assume that the liberty of emigration is not destroyed by the interdiction, which is to affect property only, then the curatory would fall to be dissolved when naturalisation (but not mere emigration) had taken place, and the emigrant must have his property restored to him.²⁹ This rule will give the line for dealing with the

Landr.* ii. p. 302, on the ground that an interdiction imposed by the proper authority gives rise to a legal condition of the person, which, to use the expression of the Supreme Court of Appeal, complaints which a report of the United States Consul Byers raised against the officers of some Swiss cantons, who refused to give up the property of persons who had been under curatory, but who had subsequently emigrated to the United States.^{30 31}

The incapacity of the prodigal has often been ranked with the loss of disposing power which falls upon a bankrupt. This is, however, incorrect. The bankrupt is not incapable of legal acts; he can certainly enter upon contracts, although the other party does not thereby acquire any rights against the sequestrated estate; and by Roman law he may renounce a succession that opens to him. The curatory that exists in bankruptcy is also not merely for the benefit of the bankrupt, but has for its end to protect the estate for the creditors.³²

has an universal claim for recognition, or, as Böhlau says, accompanies the person everywhere. This is, however, a petitio principii. A legal condition of the person is in legal import merely a figurative expression, which combines the application of a series of legal propositions. One must however admit the judgment of the court of Lübeck to this extent, that all effects of the interdiction do not cease, and all difficulty is got rid of by the simple expedient of holding that, in such a case of emigration, the interdiction and curatory are provisionally continued until the authorities of the State, in which the emigrant is being naturalised, are in a position to decide whether they are to be dissolved. The judgment of the court at Lübeck recognises that the curatory ceases ipso jure, if interdiction is no part of the law of the country in which the person has settled.

The Tribunal of the Seine adopted the reasoning of Duke Charles's counsel, and the court of Paris affirmed the judgment on 16th January 1836, because the question was as to a political rule which had no operation in a foreign country. Cf. Sirey, 36, 2, pp. 70-78; Gand, No. 512.

This latter ground, if sound, is very far-reaching. The community of legal interests belonging to different nations, which finds its expression in private international law, cannot apply to acts of the State authority, which quit the area of the regular legal order of things and direct themselves, as exceptional measures, against individuals, although they may end in giving rise to judicial steps of procedure, such as arrestments. Accordingly, the German deprivation laws of 1866 can produce no effect upon the property of the dethroned princes in foreign countries.

NOTE G ON § 152. RECOGNITION OF FOREIGN INTERDICTIONS.

["Certainly, in this country, no effect would be given to any legal incapacity merely dependent on the decrees of a foreign tribunal until those decrees were here produced. When produced, they might be received as proof of incapacity till redargued. But a foreign interdiction, even when properly vouched here, can hardly have any effect in this country till publication according to the forms of Scots law."—Fraser, "Parent and Child," p. 588. The cases in which English and foreign courts have exercised their jurisdiction in the interdiction of foreigners resident but not domiciled in the territory of the court, or in the administration of their affairs in case of lunacy, are noted below, note on the paragraphs dealing with Curatory generally.

ON SOME SPECIAL CASES OF LIMITED CAPACITY FOR OBLIGATIONS.

(S. Cum Velleianum, S. Cum Macedonianum.)

§ 153. We have already enunciated the view that the so-called special incapacities to act should have no claim for recognition in a foreign country. We propose now simply to show that some rules of law of this description are in substance rules as to solemnities or forms, which create difficulties in incurring particular obligations, and are in some respects very important.

(1.) As regards the limitations put upon women, and specially upon wives, in Roman law by the S. Cons. Velleianum, the "Authentica si qua mulier,"³³ the suretyship of a woman is, as a rule, null unless a particular form, viz. the execution of a public deed subscribed by three witnesses, be observed; besides that, it may be defeated by pleading the S. Cons. Velleianum as an exception; and in all cases, finally, the suretyship of a wife undertaken for her husband is null. In practice, however, this is so far modified that a cautionary obligation, which was undertaken or ratified on oath by a woman, after she had been instructed by a person learned in the law as to its consequences (and in the case of a married woman undertaking such an obligation for her husband in his absence), is held valid.³⁴ According to the Roman law of modern times, the matter is reduced to this—since a woman by observing the forms introduced by

³⁴ Cf. Puchta, Pandect, § 407. The Hanoverian statute of 28th Dec. 1821, for instance, requires, in doing away with the cautionary obligation upon oath, that the woman should be instructed by the court, and that the obligation of suretyship should be published in the minutes of the court. On the provisions of the law of Spain, see Lehr, Elements of Spanish Law, 1880, p. 406. By a Prussian statute of 1st Dec. 1869, applicable to the whole monarchy except the jurisdiction of Köln, all the special provisions as to the suretyship of women are swept away.

practice and the Canon Law, can always become surety—that special protective forms exist for women with reference to the assumption of cautionary obligations. If, then, any recognition at all is to be given to the rule “locus regit actum,” a cautionary obligation undertaken without the protective forms must be held to be valid, if the woman had the power to become surety without them at the place where it was undertaken, and that too in spite of the assumption that all “special” incapacities are to be determined in accordance with the lex domicilii. Conversely, a cautionary obligation, which a woman is by the law of her domicile capable of undertaking, is not invalid, although these provisions of the Roman law are in force by the lex loci actus. Thus, for instance, a woman domiciled in dominions where Roman law is the common law, can undertake a valid obligation of this kind, where the Common Code of Austria,³⁵ or the Code Civil,³⁶ is recognised, and the cautionary obligation of a woman domiciled in France or Austria is not invalid, if she becomes surety without special instruction as to the law, or ratification upon oath, in any country where the S. Cons. Velleianum and the “Authentica si qua mulier” are in force as part of the common law of the land.³⁷

(2.) By Roman law (S. Cons. Macedonianum), the obligations incurred by persons still under paternal power, by receipt of a loan, are as a rule of no effect. We cannot here appeal to any such ground as was urged with reference to the cautionary obligations of women, that by modern law the act becomes valid if certain forms are observed. Besides the general grounds already adduced, we have the following argument in favour of the opinion we have adopted. Even by the provisions of the Roman law, if the lender did not know that the borrower was under paternal power, and had a reasonable ground for his ignorance, the S. Cons. Macedonianum could not be pleaded.³⁸ According to the meaning and the spirit of the whole enactment, this must be extended to the case of the son who is in a foreign country, the inhabitants of which are not required to know our laws, and, looking to their own law, have not the possibility of such a plea before their eyes.³⁹ One sees that even in those days the law of Rome came

³⁶ The Code Civil has tacitly removed the provisions of the Roman law.

³⁷ The judgment of the Cour Royale of Paris of 15th March 1831, affirmed by the Court of Cassation (Sirey, xxxiii. i. p. 665), which declared the suretyship of a Spanish lady, who, in undertaking a cautionary obligation for her husband, had hypothecated her real property in France, to be valid, is according to the view we have adopted right in its result, but not upon the grounds taken by the Cour Royale. These were—1st, Because the property hypothecated was situated in France, and therefore the personal capacity of the female pursuer to incur obligations, and the effect of the obligations incurred by her (which she maintained to be null) must be determined by French law; 2nd, Because contracts and obligations which had been made and undertaken in France, and for the performance of which a party was entitled to sue in a French court, could be subject to no other law than that of France.

³⁸ L. 3, § 1; D. ad S. Cons. Macedonianum, 14, 6.

pretty near the solution of the question which was recommended as a general principle for legislation in international relations (supra, § 142).

An objection to our view might be raised upon the ground that the inhabitants of a country where the Senatus Consultum is in force, would only have to take a journey into some other country where it is not recognised, in order to escape its provisions. But although we have laid it down that the S. Cons. Macedonianum is not to be applied to every case in accordance with the personal law, we do not mean to say that the validity of the loan is to be determined by the law of the place where it is made. What we have said is that the competency of pleading the Senatus Consultum will be determined by the same law as will regulate the validity of the loan in other respects; and that law, in the case supposed of a transaction in fraudem legis will be, as we shall show in connection with the law of obligations, just the law of the State to which the contracting parties belong, or of their domicile, whichever of these general principles of regulation we adopt.

Here, too, as in the case of the S. Cons. Velleianum, the validity of the loan can be maintained, although it is made in conformity merely with the law recognised at the place of the domicile or the national home of the debtor.⁴⁰ A son under paternal power, therefore, who has his domicile in Hamburg,⁴¹ may validly incur an obligation by receiving a loan in a country where the common law of Rome is recognised.⁴²

The same principles that determined the validity of the exceptio S. Ci. Macedoniani will find application to analogous cases—e.g., the invalidity which particular systems attribute to loans made to members of particular classes of persons.

We have already discussed the proper determination of the capacity to contract by bills, and we shall return to it when we come to deal with the law of bills. We can only repeat that in all the questions that may arise under this head commercial intercourse is sufficiently protected; and the object in view is not overshot, if we apply the principle of protecting a party, who contracts in good faith, and is not completely negligent of his own interests, against objections that may be supported by reference to rules of law unknown to the lex loci actus.

APPENDIX.

In integrum restitutio.

§ 154. In integrum restitutio is the reduction in certain cases of a legal relation that has been entered upon, or the restoration of a relation that has been lost, by means of the decree of a judge, upon considerations of equity and expediency. It belongs to no special division of our subject, and is rather a measure of universal application, for it may conceivably be applied in every department known to private law, and even to many that belong to public law, according to the provisions that may be laid down by the law of each territory. The position we have assigned to it at the close of the discussion on the law of persons is justified in this way, that there is no room in a treatise on private international law for what is called a "general chapter," such as we find in the textbooks of particular territorial laws; the purely logical development of legal ideas, which supplies the material for such a chapter, cannot from its nature be made the subject of a work upon the conflict of laws; while this in integrum restitutio, just because it may be found in connection with most relations of private law, is most aptly treated at the very beginning of the system.

⁴⁰ Bouhier, cap. 27, No. 3; Walter, § 45; Thöl., § 85, note 7; Savigny, § 364; Guthrie, p. 158, pronounce for the universal validity of the lex domicilii in reference to the S. Cons. Macedonianum.

⁴¹ The laws of Hamburg know nothing of the exceptio S. Ci. Macedoniani (Baumeister's Hamburgisches Privatr. ii. p. 51).

The special characteristic of this restitution is, that the judgment of the court, instead of making a declaration as to a legal relation already in existence, or what is to be assumed as in existence by the representations of parties—the ordinary case in a civil suit—here deliberately and consciously reduces a legal relation that exists, or restores one that has been lost.¹ We might, therefore, by reversing the considerations which in ordinary cases of civil suits exclude the application of the lex fori because of the end that is in view² (setting aside the class of suits which the court holds to be immoral or indecent), hold that the lex fori is applicable in all cases of restitution; and some authors do in fact take this view.³ But although restitution has for its object to re-establish a legal relation that has been lost, or to reduce one that exists, it does both of these things upon grounds which were present at the time when that relation originated or was lost; in other words, the competency of restitution implies an imperfect invalidity in the origin or extinction of the legal relation which is concerned,⁴ and one end in view is to support that existing state of legal relations which the ordinary rules of law justify, by aid, first, of a special proviso that the person who desires to avail himself of the invalidity in question shall have to appeal to the judge; next, by the possibility of renouncing the legal remedy and allowing prescription to run upon that renunciation; and, lastly, by permitting the judge to pronounce a broad judgment, not hampered by any particular narrow rules of law, in all such cases as it shall appear to him to be for the interest, and in conformity with the requirements of legal intercourse to do so. As, therefore, there is no place, for the application of the lex fori in questions involving substantive legal rights, the result is that this in integrum restitutio falls under the same local law as that to which the legal relation affected by the proposed restitution belongs. This is the view which most authorities take. The result of this is, that restitution against the loss of a real right in immoveable property is determined by the lex rei sitæ,⁵ against the consequences of a binding contract by the laws to which this contract is subject for other purposes,⁶ against the prescription of a suit by the laws by which the suit is itself to be ruled, and against delays of process⁷ and judicial sentences by the law of the place where the process is proceeding.

Many writers, however, make an exception in regard to the restitution of minors. They hold that to be merely a special mode of the operation of incapacity to act, and therefore they determine it according to the lex domicilii of him who seeks the restitution.⁸ But although the restitution which is ensured for minors may, as a matter of fact, have consequences resembling those of incapacity to act, and although in classical Roman law it served, as a matter of fact, as a substitute for incapacity, so as to protect them against prejudicial transactions,⁹ yet in a juristic sense they are quite distinct from each other, just as much as a penal statute against persons who take a dishonest advantage of a minor is distinct from a statute prescribing the incapacity of minors.¹⁰ Such a penal statute has a common object with the other; but it follows necessarily, from the difference of the path by which the object is reached, that there can be no question in such a case of applying to both the lex domicilii of the minor.

At the same time, the following modifications of the general rule we have expounded must be recognised as applicable to the restitution of minors in conformity with the lex domicilii.

(1.) The restitution of minors in modern law,¹¹ where they have no capacity to act, rests upon the ground that because of their minority they are not fit to attend to their own affairs, and that they are from their minority under guardianship; but whether this latter fact is true or not depends, as we have seen, upon the personal law, and so, therefore, must the further question whether a person in a question of restitution is to be treated as a minor.¹²

¹² Cf. J. Voet, l.c.

(2.) The restitution of minors rests upon a special protection which is extended to them. That, however, can only take place where it is so extended by the personal law of the minor. If a foreign State proposed to afford such protection to a minor against the law of his own State, no benefit would accrue to the minor,¹³ but his credit would much more probably be shaken, and his position as a person of property thrown into confusion. No restitution, therefore, can be afforded by a foreign court where it is excluded on the head of minority by the personal law.¹⁴ This is perhaps unimportant, since, if restitution of minors is not recognised by the lex domicilii, it may be assumed that the constitution of the administration by curators is such as to render this legal remedy unnecessary or even prejudicial.¹⁵

¹³ See the exposition given above, § 135.

¹⁴ Huber, § 12; Ricci, p. 522. The Supreme Court of Appeal at Celle laid down, in a judgment of 1782, that a native of Magdeburg, who sought restitutio in integrum from the Court of Hanover, must have suffered the lesion complained of before his twenty-first year (in accordance with the law of his domicile). V. Bülow and Hagemann, Prakt. Erört. i. p. 150 (cf. Rundohr, Jurist. Erfahrungen, iii. p. 992). (In the older provinces of Hanover, Roman law is the common law.)

¹⁵ Wächter, ii. pp. 174-179, is of the opinion that the judge can only give the minor restitution in so far as the laws of the judge permit. This argument, however, would necessitate the application of the lex fori, not here only, but in every other case.

Fifth Book.

LAW OF THE FAMILY.

INTRODUCTORY.

§ 155. The law of the family is, as we have already remarked above, to be ruled by the law of the State to which the person belongs, or, as others will have it, by the lex domicilii. Difficulties arise, however, in this subject, either because—

In the first place, the persons who are concerned belong to different States, or have different domiciles, as the case may be. The question then comes to be, whether the personal law of the one or that of the other is to rule, or whether, and to what extent, the rules laid down by the laws of both of the persons concerned must be observed, in order to effect a binding contract, e.g. a marriage:

In the second place, the persons concerned may change their allegiance, or domiciles, as the case may be; it may then be matter of doubt whether, and to what extent, the earlier or the later allegiance, or domicile, as the case may be, should give the rule:

In the third place, the exercise of privileges belonging to the law of the family may be hampered by the law of the person's residence:

In the fourth place, the will of the persons concerned supplies the rule to a certain extent, and it is to be ascertained from the circumstances:

In the fifth place, the family relations may produce effects upon the law of property, which in itself may be subject to the law of some other territory.

In seeking solutions for the important questions which international law presents in connection with the law of the family, we must, as an essential, keep constantly in our view that the laws of different countries must be so interpreted, and an international agreement must so far as possible be effected, so as to avoid conflicting decisions as to the family status of one and the same person, since it is in family relations that such conflicts will be specially dangerous, and will have a specially prejudicial effect on public morality.¹

I. MARRIAGE.

INTRODUCTORY.

§ 156. The special difficulties in the international treatment of marriage,² arise from the facts that—

In the first place, marriage on the one hand rests upon a consensus, i.e. upon a contract, while on the other hand the effects or consequences of this contract are not subject to the will of the parties, but are regulated directly by the law. As marriage is intended to set up a permanent condition, the law which regulates it is naturally the law of the State to which the spouses permanently belong; but again, the spouses, in virtue of their free powers of emigration, may withdraw themselves from the dominion of any particular law:

In the second place, marriage is in its essence a relation which cannot come into existence, or continue in existence, on the part of one only of the two spouses, and, again, it would seem that it can only be realised, if the personal law is the same for both the husband and the wife; and thus it may seem to be a question how far the freedom of emigration of one of the spouses should give way to the principle of the unity of the law of the marriage, or, conversely, how far this principle of unity is to give way to the freedom of emigration:³

In the third place, very serious differences must be admitted to exist on this subject in the legal systems of civilised States, which in other respects are closely akin, while it is just on such a subject as this that differences are directly traceable to principles of morals or of manners, and are therefore most unfavourable to the application of foreign rules of law.

A. PERSONAL CAPACITY TO CONTRACT MARRIAGE. IMPEDIMENTS TO MARRIAGE. CONSENT OF THE SPOUSES.

NECESSITY FOR OBSERVANCE OF THE PERSONAL LAW. DIFFERENT VIEW TAKEN BY THE LAW OF THE UNITED STATES, AND BY THE SWISS STATUTE OF 1874.

§ 157. (1.) The jurisprudence of the Continent of Europe has long been agreed that the capacity to contract marriage must exist, in order that a marriage should be valid, according to the law of the parties' own country:^{4 5} and that in any event it is not enough if they have such capacity by the law of the place in which the marriage is celebrated. The decisions of the English courts are more and more approaching the same result.^{6 7} The jurisprudence of the United States, however, will, as the law of England once did, keep the law of the place of celebration in view at the same time to this extent, that it will hold a marriage which is valid according to that law to be valid everywhere. This point of view is in recent times represented by Wharton:⁸ at least he can see no reason for deviating from it as far as America is concerned.⁹

The law, in setting up rules as to the possibility of marriage, means, on the one hand, to provide for the welfare of its citizens, by protecting them from the consequences of premature marriages, or marriages without full consent.¹⁰ On the other hand, it has in view also the welfare of families, when, for example, it forbids the union of persons too closely related to

⁶ Burge (i. pp. 190-194, 195), and apparently also Story (§ 119*a*), following Huber, § 8; and Bouhier, ch. 24, § 12, 90, would refuse to recognise a marriage which was celebrated in a foreign country in fraudem legis, merely to avoid some prohibition which prevailed in the country to which the parties belonged.

¹⁰ This consideration supplies us with a principle by means of which we can solve this peculiar case. It may happen that the personal law of a man, who is intending to marry, obliges him to seek the assent of some relative, while this relative is subject to a law which gives him no such right to assent to the marriage. The assent must be required all the same, in respect that its object is to protect immature persons, just as much as to recognise a right of the relative in question. But we cannot apply this rule to the case of the Actes respectueux, which, by article 151 of the Code Civil, persons up to the age of twenty-five years must pay to their relatives. (But see a judgment of the Trib. Civ. of the Seine on 21st Dec. 1885, Jour. xiii. p. 443.)

each other: for the family is the kernel of the State. It would be unreasonable to release citizens from the obligations of their own law, provided they contracted their marriages in another country, crossing the frontier and returning again at once. And again, what interest would any State have in subjecting persons, who had no permanent connection with it, to these rules? And, granting that it desired to do so, could it do so effectually? Will any State forbid all foreigners, to whose marriage, if they were subjects of its own, it would have some objection, to reside in its territories? It would lose itself in a sea of troublesome inquiries.

But, on the other hand, the application of the law of the place of celebration may be defended on the ground that persons who desire to enter on a marriage, should not be checked by the application of the personal law of one or other of the spouses. Considerations of this kind will to a certain extent commend themselves in the case of other contracts, but they have no application to a contract of marriage.¹¹

In the case of an union for life, it would in almost every case be an act of wanton thoughtlessness to forbear to make close enquiry into the personal circumstances of the other party; and rules of law are not set up for entirely exceptional cases. Durand, too, is justified in saying that, if there were a country which sanctioned a marriage, forbidden by the rest of the world, this one system of law would be sufficient to furnish a means of evading the laws of every other civilised country. The more intercourse extends, the more intolerable must the practical results of a rule be, which should prescribe that a marriage valid at the place of celebration should settle all questions as to the capacity of the parties to contract marriage, or to contract marriage with each other. That such a rule can be still observed in the United States without serious difficulties, and without creating the most open disregard of the law, may be explained by the fact that that country is separated from most other civilised States by the ocean. But as the ocean more and more ceases to constitute a barrier against a return to one's own country, so much the more distinctly must the intrinsic fault of their system make itself felt, as indeed we see in the case of England, where it is gradually being abandoned, as the

Channel ceases to be an obstacle to free intercourse.¹² Wharton is of opinion that the rule, that the personal capacity for contracting a marriage shall be determined by the law of the place of the celebration, is in America recommended by the considerations that, on the one hand, the many limitations which the old world puts upon the capacity of contracting marriage (e.g. by requiring the consent of parents) are contrary to the natural ideas of the United States, and that restrictions of that class are only suitable for countries which are afraid of being overpopulated, whereas in the United States there is still room for a large increase of population. That leads us back to the principle enunciated by Savigny, which in my opinion is erroneous, that where economical reasons may be assigned as the foundation of any rule of law—although the necessity of the parents' consent has, as a matter of history, an origin elsewhere than in economical theories—or where you can discover a conflict of ideas or theories of morals, then foreign rules of law are to be ignored. We have already noticed that this view is untenable; the question of population, on which Wharton lays so much stress, is only justified, if the States declare themselves willing to accept as permanent citizens the persons in question, i.e. if they declare them to be American citizens, and give them naturalisation. They may facilitate naturalisation in the States, instead of rendering it more difficult, as they are at present doing, and this they may do without giving new citizens the political franchise at once. But to determine the personal capacity for marriage by the lex loci actus can have no other result than to lead to deplorable confusion, in the case of persons who have any intention of returning to Europe. For the State to which they belong will not make up its mind to recognise the rule laid down by the United States.

The last line of defence for this rule of the United States is its alleged simplicity.¹³ People who wish to marry, do not require to furnish any information as to the law of the country to which they belong, etc., and much smaller demands will be made on the intelligence and prudence of the authorities who are charged with the superintendence of the law of status, than would fall to be made under a system which applied the personal law in such matters. But as intercourse increases this advantage turns to a disadvantage: the whole system ends in a general subversion of the authority of the law.¹⁴

¹² At the same time, the present law of Switzerland shows a certain inclination to this system. See König's proposal to the Institute of Dr. Inter. (Annuaire, 9th year, pp. 73, 74).

¹³ But see Phillimore's excellent remarks, iv. § 336.

¹⁴ It might be thought that, if we were to adopt the view which makes the personal law dependent on the domicile, there would be no such great objection to allowing the law of the place of celebration to give the rule for determining all questions, since the official or clergyman of the domicile would be the competent and proper authority to celebrate the marriage. But, in the first place, the official of the bride's domicile is just as much the competent and proper person as the official of the bridegroom's domicile: in the second place, in such matters the conception of domicile is frequently not very accurate, e.g. the Imperial German Statute of 1875, § 42, places the ordinary residence on the same footing as domicile; and, in the third place, the incompetency of the authority who celebrates is, according to many systems of law, not fatal to the validity of the marriage. See German Imperial Statute, § 42, subsec. 2.

RESPECT DUE TO THE LAW OF THE PLACE OF CELEBRATION ; DETERMINATION AS TO MARRIAGES ACTUALLY CONTRACTED, ON THE ONE HAND, AND RULE OF CONDUCT FOR STATE OFFICIALS, ON THE OTHER.

§ 158. We have noticed that there is a general agreement to assume that there is capacity to contract marriage, and that the law of the country of the spouses will give the rule, in cases in which the laws of the countries of both spouses affirm their capacity ; and that in such cases no heed need be paid to any restrictive law on the subject which may happen to exist at the place of the celebration, e.g. a law which makes the validity of the marriage dependent on the consent of the father and the like.

On the other hand, this question may be raised: If the intending spouses have full capacity to marry according to the law of State A, need the authorities of that State concern themselves with the enquiry, whether they possess that capacity by the law of the country to which they belong? May we not say—just as the parties to any other contract you like may dictate it in any terms they please to a notary, who cannot refuse to authenticate it, so long as it is not prohibited by the law which he is bound to obey, although it may possibly be of no validity—that the parties in the case of marriage must be entitled to contract a marriage at their own risk, although by the law of the country to which they belong it may not be effectual?

The practice of almost all States—except that of the United States—very properly pronounces against any such freedom¹⁵ of marriage. If the marriage is invalid in the home of the intending spouses, the most serious disadvantages would arise from such a recognition, not only for the spouses themselves, but in the future for their descendants, their family. In fact, marriage will be degraded to the level of a miserable farce, at least if the law of the married person's own State is to have extra-territorial effect, in so far as the main legal incidents and qualities of the marriage are concerned: and again, if the descendants of a marriage of a foreigner with a native woman, which has been declared to be invalid, should at any time be in want of means of support, the burden of their maintenance may fall upon the woman's country. We are therefore well founded in requiring that the intending spouses shall show that by the law of their own country they are capable of contracting marriage. Of course, we cannot require absolutely irrefutable proof: proof of that kind could only be got by way of a legal process. No such irrefutable proof is required even when both spouses are natives of this country. A process of nullity may be brought to cut down a marriage contracted by spouses belonging to this country before the officials of this country. In international practice we are contented with certificates^{16 17} from the officials of the country to which the intended spouses belong.

In this connection it would be desirable that provision should be made by statute, or by international treaties framed with precision and care, for the appointment of officials, who should be in a position to issue such certificates, and should have a competent knowledge of the law. At present parties and the officials charged with the superintendence of matters of status are often puzzled to know what officials should or may issue these certificates.¹⁸ The best machinery for the purpose would be small divisions of judges sitting together. The matter, as one affecting the prosperity of whole families, is too important to be committed to subordinate administrative officials merely, or to the officials charged with the superintendence of civil status, particularly as, in many instances, legal rules must be expounded to some foreign official. Again, on the other hand, I am unable to understand how the issue of such certificates is inconsistent with the position which a judge occupies. It may no doubt be that occasionally a certificate of the kind may give an incorrect answer to some difficult question of law, or that, in a process afterwards raised in the courts, the tribunal of ultimate resort takes a different view. But we know that such rectifications of judicial opinions and decisions take place in other matters, and no one finds anything unbecoming in the fact that they do so take place. At all events, some precaution would be taken to ensure the legal rights of the parties.¹⁹

§ 159. But, on the other hand, it may be asked whether no attention at all is to be paid to a prohibitive law which is in force at the place where it is proposed to celebrate the marriage. Here a distinction must be taken,²⁰ although it is a distinction which is not always kept clearly enough in view.²¹

A. Suppose the question to be as to the validity of a marriage already celebrated. In that case we cannot admit any exception.²² The State in whose dominions the marriage ceremony has taken place, has no interest at all to look upon this marriage as any less valid than a marriage contracted by foreigners in their own country. If we recognise a marriage between two foreigners, who are not yet according to our law capable of contracting marriage, there is no reason for refusing to recognise it, because the consent of these persons happens to have been interchanged within our territory.^{23 24} prohibitory procedure. For this reason the following provision was inserted in the project which Brusa and I laid before the Institute of International Law in 1885 (Annuaire, viii. p. 68): "Régulièrement l'admissibilité du mariage en conformité de la loi nationale de la partie est pronvée par un certificat de l'autorité compétente de la partie."

"Néanmoins, lorsque la fiancée a l'âge requis per sa loi nationale, l'officier de l'état civil ne lui demandera pas son certificat national, si après une notification du mariage projeté, faite par la fiancée au consulat ou à la légation de son Etat un délai convenable est passé sans que l'officier de l'état civil ait reçu un acte formel d'opposition. Le délai sera fixé par la cour supérieure à la demande de la fiancée."

²⁰ In the proposals, which were in 1885 made to the Institute of International Law by Brusa and myself, it will be found that these two questions are kept apart, cf. especially § 5 of the proposal (Annuaire, 8th year, p. 68). In the transactions at Heidelberg in 1887 (Annuaire, 9, pp. 107 and 127), the necessity of the distinction is recognised.

²¹ The provisions of the Italian Statute Book (§ 102) are indistinct: "La capacità dello straniero a contrarre matrimonio è determinato dalle leggi del paese a cui appartiene."

"Anche lo straniero però è soggetto agli impedimenti stabiliti nella sezione seconda del capo I. di questo libro."

Literally read, these provisions would make foreigners subject not only to the prohibitions of the law of Italy in the case of too near relationship, but also to those enactments which require the consent of parents. Esperson (Jour. vii. p. 342) proposes on this account to distinguish between conditions affirmatives, and negatives, and to make the latter only apply to foreigners. I do not think that this distinction can be logically carried out; the requirement, e.g. of a particular age, may be expressed in an affirmative as well as in a negative form.

B. The question may be whether the officials of our State, especially those charged with the care of matters of status, shall lend a hand in the celebration of any matrimonial ties that can be conceived between foreigners, merely on the authority of the laws of these foreigners themselves, without regard to our law, and to the views of morality and propriety that prevail in this country. This question is undoubtedly to be answered in the negative. That result must plainly be so, if the same sexual connection would be held to be a criminal delict in this country, e.g. incest or polygamy.²⁵

But we must limit such marriages still further.²⁶ A solemn union of two persons with the co-operation of the public authorities may lead to an open scandal, even although the sexual union does not imply a criminal delict; e.g. two persons may propose to be married, who, according to our views, are clearly too young to give a solemn consent to marriage, or a widow may desire to wed in defiance of the period of mourning that is unconditionally prescribed by our law. Prohibitions of this kind must be recognised by our officials, who are concerned with matters of status, being, as they are, unconditional according to our law, and irrespective of the law of the country to which the intending spouses belong. No doubt, in so far as age is concerned, we might allow dispensations in the case of foreigners. The climate in which the individual was born and grew up, and his descent, have an influence on the maturity of his intellect and powers of deliberation. On that account, no general rule can be laid down to determine how far the law that rules our officials may take into account the divergent law which regulates the matter in the native country of the proposed spouses. A reasonable discretion must decide; and that had better be committed to the discretion of a divisional court. On the other hand, I am of opinion that our official can never depart from the law of this country which regulates the widow's period of mourning. If the primary reason for such limitations on marriage is to guard against the turbatio sanguinis, as it is termed (more correctly, the uncertainty of paternity), it might be said that so far as foreigners' families are concerned,²⁷ our State is not interested in the matter; the point in dispute still is, whether our officials are to lend a helping hand to such turbatio sanguinis, and are to consent to assist in realising, what our manners and customs treat as an impropriety. If we are to be strict, that is inadmissible.²⁸ In this case there can be no dispensations, or at least only to the extent to which our law allows them.²⁹

²⁵ Cf. Olivi, Rev. xv. p. 221. According to a paper by Olivecrona, Jour. xi. p. 356, no foreigners can be married in Sweden, if by the law of Sweden there is any impediment to their marriage.

²⁷ For this reason many people hold a provision of that kind (cf., for instance, Code Civil, § 228) to be simply a personal law, so that the lex loci actus is not to be taken into consideration as regards the marriage. Laurent, v. § 325; Fiore, Jour. xiii. p. 169; Trib. Civ. de la Seine, 4th Jan. 1872.

We must not, however, go any further.³⁰ The case of the marriage of persons who are obviously immature, and the marriage of a widow whose husband is but a short time dead, are the only instances in which (putting out of view unions which involve a criminal offence) marriage, according to the rules of capacity observed by the foreign system of law, can imply an open offence against the sentiments of propriety which prevail in the place of the celebration. Too near relationship, which does not, however, exhibit the sexual union as a crime, has no concern for a State to which the spouses owe no permanent allegiance. Still less will that State pay any regard to the consent of parents, if the domestic law of the foreign spouses takes no account of it. Even the capacity of a divorced spouse to re-marry, is simply to be determined by the law of the country to which he belongs. If the law of the place in which the marriage is to take place knows no real divorce, as was the case in France before the statute of 7th July 1884 came into operation, still the officer charged with the care of matters of status cannot, according to a sound view of principle, refuse to proceed with the wedding.³¹ And the question must be answered in the same way, in the case where one spouse has disappeared and has been declared to be dead, and the other has, in consequence, the right of marrying again. Laurent (vi. § 339) proposes that the law of the place in which the second marriage is entered into, shall in this case be observed, in so far as it prohibits a marriage in these circumstances; but the reason which he assigns, viz. that we are in such cases dealing with a crime, which must be dealt with by the law of the place where the act was done, rests on a petitio principii.

²⁹ The case of observance of the period of mourning by foreign spouses I do not think very important, and on that account the proposals which were made by Brusa and myself to the Institute of International Law took no notice of it.

³¹ That is the preponderating result of modern French jurisprudence. Verger, p. 23 (see citations in Weiss, p. 635); so, too, Fiore, § 34 (Jour. xiii. p. 170); Esperson (Jour. vii. p. 344). At this date there is no divorce in Italy. French jurisprudence recognised this effect of a foreign decree of divorce, even in cases in which the marriage had been celebrated in France (cf. Verger, p. 25), and that, too, even when the spouses did not become foreigners until after their marriage. Verger (p. 270) will not come to the same conclusion if only one of the spouses has emigrated: "en effet, si pour l'accomplissement du mariage, il faut le concours de deux capacités, ce concours est nécessaire aussi pour le rompre. L'incapacité de l'un des deux époux ne peut être convertie par la capacité de l'autre."

WHAT IS TO BE THE RESULT, IF THE PERSONAL LAW OF THE BRIDEGROOM, ON THE ONE HAND, AND THAT OF THE BRIDE, ON THE OTHER, GIVE DIFFERENT RULES AS TO THE CAPACITY OF THE PARTIES?

§ 160. Must there be personal capacity, both absolutely and in respect of the particular marriage that is in question, according to the laws of both spouses—according to that of the bride, as well as that of the bridegroom?³²

Many authorities³³ answer this question with a direct affirmative. For although, by her marriage, the woman enters the State to which her husband belongs, still a condition precedent to her entry is that she shall be capable of it, and her capacity can only be determined by the law to which she has, up to that moment, belonged.

A distinction must, however, be taken. The marriage is to subsist in the husband's State, and it is to this State that the family, the foundation of which is laid by the marriage, is to belong. Impediments to marriage, which are considered indispensable for the good of families, or of the State itself, to which the new family is to belong in permanence, will be taken into account in the light of the law of the State to which the family is intended to belong, i.e. the law of the husband's State, and will be judged of by that law. To this class belong the objection founded on too close kinship, the objection which takes its origin in the prohibition by the State of marriages between adherents of different religious professions,³⁴ etc.,³⁵ or in the necessity of an authoritative permission to marry, as a proof of capacity to acquire rights of property thereby. None of these matters concern the State to which the woman has up to that time belonged, and ³² Peculiarly enough, the proposals made to the Institute of International Law at Munich in 1883, by Arntz and Westlake, suggested that the law of the place of the celebration should be observed, as well as the domestic law of the spouses, and yet no provision was made as to whether the existence of impediments by the law of the place of celebration should merely interfere with the exercise by the officials of their powers, or should infer a nullity in the marriage, although it had been celebrated (cf. Annuaire, 7th year, 1883-1885, p. 43, §§ 2 and 3).

³⁴ Or among persons of different races. Thus the decision of the Civil Tribunal of Pontoise (Jour. xii. p. 296), in 1884, was in its results quite correct, viz. that although, by the law of the place of celebration, a marriage between a white and a coloured person was null, such an impediment to marriage was not to be recognised as effecting the marriage of a Frenchman to a negress. The reason given, viz. "Attendu que les empêchements de cette nature ne sauraient exister qu'autant que l'incapacité relative de l'époux déclaré incapable rencontre dans l'autre époux cette même incapacité," is certainly wrong. The effect of the vows of a religious order on the husband, if by his personal law (loi nationale) it is an impediment, as a matter of municipal law, is to annul his marriage, even with a Frenchwoman and celebrated in France (Aubry et Rau, i. § 31, note 6). To the same effect, Merlin, Rép. Loi, § 6, note 6; so, too, Olivi, Rev. xv. p. 226.

³⁵ Laurent insists on this distinction (§ 323), but he gives it some mysterious connection with his theory of statut réel.

which she is now quitting. As the woman has in any view a right to emigrate, she has the power, by naturalising herself in a new country, of denying effect to all these limitations imposed by the law to which she once belonged. Naturalisation as a preliminary to marriage would, however, in such cases be an empty form, and all the more so, as all States accord naturalisation directly to the wife of a citizen of the country ipso jure.³⁶ ³⁷

But the case is quite otherwise with impediments to marriage, which have more the character of rules of private law, and are directed obviously to the protection of the individual and his or her rights. These provisions, in so far as they confer a right upon the wife herself to attack the marriage as a nullity, are not in any case lost by the fact of marriage.³⁸ The State which sets up impediments to marriage of this nature—e.g. defective age, error, compulsion or force, impotence in the husband—has, on the contrary, the most vital interest in maintaining them even in the case of foreign marriages, just for the protection of its own subjects. The State, however, into which the woman would otherwise pass by her marriage, must allow these impediments their full effect, although it has not enacted them for its own citizens, just because, directly or indirectly, they touch upon the consent through which the foreign woman has entered upon the marriage, and thereby also upon a new allegiance.³⁹ Indeed it is plain, in the case of

A judgment of the Supreme Court of Austria, of 17th January 1871 (Jour. iv. p. 77), pronounced the marriage of an Austrian woman, a Catholic, who had been separated from her husband, to be null. A more recent decision of the same court, of 26th November 1876, follows the opposite theory, which is in agreement with that which is adopted in the text (Jour. iv. pp. 78, 79). The editorial note on p. 78 pronounces in favour of the former. A judgment of the same Supreme Court, of 6th March 1878 (Jour. vi. p. 500), seems in its reasoning, which is somewhat generally expressed, to recur to the former theory, according to which the grounds of incapacity must, in the case of each of the spouses, be tested absolutely by their own personal statute. In that case, however, on the one hand, there was incapacity according to the husband's own law—the law of Hungary forbids marriage between Jews and Christians, and the husband was a Hungarian Jew—and, on the other hand, the question was raised at the instance of the wife, who disputed the marriage on the ground of essential error. The decision, therefore, is much more in support of the view of the text than against it. That view would, in the circumstances, reach the same result.

³⁹ The Actes respectueux, which according to the Code Civil (§ 151) may take the place of the consent of the parents when parties are of full age, are, however, properly looked upon by French law as matters of form, which do not absolutely require to be observed in a foreign country, unless the marriage in other respects is obviously clandestine. Laurent, iv. § 271. Trib. Seine, 10th January 1885 (Jour. xii. p. 89).

several of these impediments, that the legislator who enacted them regarded the person who is affected by them as incapable of legal acts in so far as the contracting of a marriage is concerned; that is the case, for instance, where a person has not yet reached the necessary age, and so, too, if he or she is declared, on account of deficient years, to be entirely incapable of marriage, without consent of the father or guardian. If, then, in other matters we judge of incapacity to do legal acts by reference to the law of the person's own country, we must follow the same rule here also.

The matter stands differently if the consent of the father, for instance, were necessary, without respect to the age of the bride. In such a case, there could be no question of an enlargement of an imperfect capacity of action, the whole question would be as to a private right of the father. But that private right could not be taken into account as against the full right of emigration which belongs to the daughter, at least in so far as the State into which the daughter passes by virtue of her marriage is concerned. The case here is just the same as it would be if the one State set up limitations upon emigration of another kind, which other States would refuse to recognise.⁴⁰

§ 161. It is, however, sounder policy in most cases in which a daughter has succeeded in reaching a foreign territory with the man of her choice, to attribute no further effect to any absence of consent to the marriage by parents and guardians, than is recognised by the personal law of the husband himself. If the civil officer charged with such matters refuses to perform the ceremony, merely because in the bride's domicile the consent of her parents or guardians is necessary, and has not been given, the bride thereby is disgraced, and the husband is tempted afterwards to abandon the bride who has run away from her parents. It is, therefore, desirable to facilitate in such cases a dispensation for the marriage, and all the more so as many systems, which treat the want of parents' consent as a cause for the dissolution of a marriage, provide that its place may be supplied by judicial sanction given in the exercise of a discretion. Such a dispensation must be given particularly in cases in which the tribunal,⁴¹ which has power to award it, finds that the bride's purpose is deliberate and unconstrained, and that she is not prevented from returning to her parents or guardians merely by want of means of doing so. If the officials of the country, in which the intending spouses happen to be, would only celebrate the marriage after such a causa cognitio by a supreme court, it would be the best course even for the State to which the wife belongs, with a view to the good of families, and parity of treatment of the same marriage by different States, to recognise as valid a marriage of this kind.⁴²

⁴¹ Of course, the tribunal which controls the official, before whom the marriage is to take place.

For these reasons the following rules were proposed in a sketch for the regulation of international law, which Brusa and I laid before the Institute of International Law at Brussels in 1885 (Annuaire, 8th year, p. 68):—

“(5.) *L'officier de l'état civil d'un pays quelconque procédera à la célébration du mariage, si le mariage n'est pas prohibé par la loi nationale du mari.*⁴³

“Toute fois l'officier doit observer de même :

“a. Quant à la fiancée, la loi nationale de celle ci et la loi du lieu de la célébration en ce qui concerne l'âge requis pour la célébration du mariage, et encore la loi nationale de la fiancée, en ce qui concerne le consentement nécessaire des parents ou tuteurs.

“b. quant au fiancé, la loi du lieu de la célébration par rapport à l'âge requis.

“En tout cas, la dispense du consentement des parents ou tuteurs en tant que ce consentement n'est nécessaire que d'après la loi nationale de la fiancée, ne sera pas refusé, si la Cour trouve que la volonté de la fiancée est vraiment libre et réfléchie et que la fiancée n'est pas empêchée par l'indigence de retourner chez ses parents ou tuteurs.

“Si le consentement des parents ou tuteurs est également nécessaire d'après la loi nationale du mari, ce consentement sera indispensable, sauf les dispositions de l'article 6.”

As it was intended that, in the case of such a dispensation, the native State of the wife should also recognise the marriage which had been contracted, it would be desirable to add this further rule to the projected legislation, viz.: “Si la dispense est régulièrement obtenue, le mariage est valable même d'après la loi nationale du mari.”⁴⁴

It must also be held to be quite immaterial on what grounds the particular impediments to marriage are rested, whether on considerations

⁴³ There was a general principle laid down at the outset, that in every case the national law of the husband must be observed. For greater distinctness, it would have been desirable to say:—

“Quant aux empêchements le mariage ne peut être invalidé que d'après la loi nationale du mari. Pourtant le défaut de l'âge requis pour la fiancée et l'absence du consentement des parents ou tuteurs suivant la loi nationale de la fiancée doivent invalider le mariage.” of political economy, or of morality, or religion, or politics, etc. Apart from the fact that it may very often be matter of dispute what the consideration really was which moved the legislature, it is surely plain that the marriage must be governed by the law of the husband's nationality or domicile. Nothing but confusion can result from the recognition of the marriage in question by another State, on the pretext of philanthropy, or from its permitting it to be celebrated before its officials on any such ground.

Accordingly, a clergyman cannot be allowed to contract a marriage in a foreign country, if, by the law of his own country, his orders constitute a civil disability for marriage.⁴⁵ The case is different when it is only the law of the bride which prohibits such a marriage. Again, any impediments to marriage which rest upon the status of the husband will operate in countries in which such distinctions of status are unknown. For instance, a member of a reigning house is bound even in foreign countries by the disabilities which the law of his house imposes, and the foreign official must have regard to them.⁴⁶ The same result will follow as to prohibitions of marriage between white and coloured persons. So soon, however, as the foreigner acquires the nationality of the country where the marriage is to be celebrated, or of any country in which the proposed marriage is sanctioned, he acquires also capacity to contract it.⁴⁷ A slave, however, does not need to acquire any new nationality. All the effects of the nationality to which he belongs cease on the moment at which he sets foot in a country that does not recognise slavery, since slavery is no longer a legal institution that has any extra-territorial operation. A slave, then, can marry at once.⁴⁸ Other people must at least have lost the nationality which imposes on them the limitation in question. Provided that the acquisition of nationality without political rights is not made too difficult, no special disadvantages are likely to arise from a recognition of the impediments to marriage which exist in the husband's State. On the other hand, to enter on a marriage irrespective of all such impediments, whether they rest on religious or on political considerations, may infer the most serious complications, because the State to which the husband belongs will not recognise it. Capacity to contract marriage must be tested by the law of the State to which the person belonged at the time when it was contracted. This seems obvious—it has, however, an important ⁴⁵ So Merlin, Rép. v. Loi, § 6, note 6; Aubry et Rau, § 31, No. 26, C. de Paris, June 1814 (Sirey xv. i. p. 67).

⁴⁶ Laurent, iv. § 331; Olivi, Rev. xv. p. 223; Westlake, Holtzendorff, p. 64; Weiss, p. 634, are of a different opinion. But the validity of the personal statute on which Weiss so strongly insists cannot be got rid of by such arguments as, "Le droit public français basé sur l'égalité répugne aux distinctions de race: il ne connaît pas de princes de sang royal." On such topics we have to deal with nothing but public law.

application⁴⁹ to the case of a divorced spouse who, by the law of his or her earlier home, the law upon which the decree of divorce proceeds, was incapable of marrying a second time, whereas the law of the State to which he or she now belongs (in cases where the law of the domicile rules, the law of the new domicile) implies capacity for a second marriage.

This supplies us with a test for the case of Bauffremont, which we have already discussed in another connection. The Princess Bauffremont, if she had been regularly naturalised in Prussia, might have demanded, in virtue of § 77 of the statute of the German Empire of 6th February 1875,⁵⁰ for the regulation of the publication of personal status—a section which came into force in Prussia after 1st March 1875—that the séparation de corps which had been pronounced in France should be converted into a decree of divorce by the competent Prussian court. She was, however, not a Prussian subject, but, if the naturalisation which had taken place was effectual, a subject of Altenburg. But the rule of the 77th section, to which we have referred, which, in virtue of § 79 of the same statute, came into force in Prussia at an early date, was not yet law in Altenburg, nor was there any other statute in force there to a like effect. Even if we were to assume—and it is a very doubtful point—that she had taken up her domicile in Berlin, and that therefore the law of Prussia became applicable to her, the séparation de corps of the French court would not of itself, ipso jure, be transformed into a decree of divorce which will allow a second marriage. That can only be done by means of a judgment in a suit instituted for the purpose, and no such suit had in this case been instituted.⁵¹

DISPENSATIONS.

§ 162. Many impediments to marriage may be got rid of by dispensations. The authority of the State by whose power the impediment in question operates, is the proper source of such dispensations. As a general rule, then, the sovereign of the country to which the person belongs is the person to give a dispensation. In some cases, however, we require a dispensation from the officials of the State in which the wedding is to be celebrated. In some cases we shall have to obtain a dispensation not only ⁴⁹ Cf. v. Sicherer, p. 139, and the judgment of the Court of Berlin of 24th Feb. 1875 there cited (Iohow, Jahrbücher für endgültige Entscheidungen, vi. p. 19).

“If a sentence of permanent separation at bed and board has been pronounced before this statute comes into force, either of the spouses may sue for dissolution of the marriage in a regular process, on the ground of the existing decree of separation, provided that the spouses have not in the meantime come together again.”

⁵¹ Cf. the clear exposition in Stölzel's paper so often cited, p. 59. Bluntschli's and v. Holtzendorff's discussions are based upon erroneous assumptions as to the law of Altenburg at the time, and consequently on a mistaken interpretation of the Imperial statute to which I have referred from them, but from the official of the State to which the parties belong. (See, however, supra, § 161.)

WANT OF CONSENT AS AN IMPEDIMENT TO MARRIAGE.

§ 163. There are, too, impediments to marriage, which have their roots not so much in the incapacity of the person, as in some defect in the expression of consent. Of this kind the most prominent impediments are force and error. We would be inclined in such cases not to apply the personal laws of the spouses, but to some extent the law which prevails at the place of the wedding, i.e. where the declaration of intention takes place. This is v. Sicherer's view.⁵² The contract, however, on which marriage is founded is not to be ranked in the same line as an ordinary obligatory contract. It has a far closer relation to the permanent legal position of the person, and cannot therefore very well submit itself to the rule of any other law than that which governs the other personal relations.

As a consequence, the law of the home of the spouses must also regulate the question whether the right of appealing to some defect in the declaration of intention can be renounced with effect. This result is an important one for the protection of a wife who has married a foreigner.

B. FORMS OF MARRIAGE.

RECOGNITION OF THE RULE "locus regit actum" IN A PERMISSIVE SENSE.

§ 164. There is a general agreement that a marriage which, in so far as its form goes,¹ is in conformity with the law of the place where it is celebrated, must be recognised everywhere as formally valid,² especially in ⁵² P. 130. On the other hand, see Laurent, iv. § 322.

² Hert, iv. 10; Cocceji, vii. 24; Hofaker, de eff. § 28; Bouhier, c. 28, No. 59; Hommel, Rhaps. Quæst. vol. ii. obs. 409; Lauterbach, Diss. Acad. iii. 128, c. 9, No. 3; Cochin, Œuvres, i. p. 153; Boullenois, i. pp. 494, 495; Pütter, Rechtsf. iii. pt. i. pp. 69-80; Titius, Jus. Pr. i. c. 10, § 21; Oppenheim, p. 393; Burge, i. p. 184; Wheaton, p. 115; Schäffner, p. 127; Fœlix, ii. p. 367, note 2. The Code Civil, in its 170th article, recognises the principle; but neglect to publish the marriage in the way which is for all that required by French law may in certain circumstances operate nullity of the marriage in France. (See Fœlix, p. 382, as to the disputed meaning of the latter part of the 170th article, cf. Mittermaier, i. 16; Stephen, i. p. 243.) French jurisprudence is now fixed to this effect, viz. that, where there is a failure to make the publication prescribed by art. 170, nullity will attach to the marriage celebrated in a foreign country only if this publication is obviously omitted, in order to the State to which the spouses belong. In accordance with what we have already said upon the principle of the rule "locus regit actum," the rule which comes into play here, we can attribute to this rule merely a permissive force, i.e. the parties may legally avail themselves also of the forms of their own country, provided always that in fact that is possible.

This is the common opinion,^{3 4} which e.g. undoubtedly lies at the bottom of the provisions of the 165th and following articles of the Code Civil. It would, of course, be possible for the legislature to provide that a marriage celebrated abroad, under the forms of a foreign country, should not be recognised, although such a course would be most unpractical and, as a rule, mischievous.⁵

LAURENT'S NEW THEORY. CRITICISM OF IT. RESOLUTIONS OF THE INSTITUTE OF INTERNATIONAL LAW.

§ 165. Laurent has recently (iv. § 230 et seq.) championed the opposite view. He thinks that this is a question of police regulations, which must be ruled by the sovereign authority of the locality. But what interest could any State, in which two persons of whom it knows nothing accidentally contract a marriage, have in seeing that its forms are observed? Of course, uncertain or defective forms of celebration may be objectionable from the point of view of a censor of morals; but considerations such as this would prove too much, for they would show that no State could suffer marriages contracted in a foreign territory to prevail in its own country, unless they were celebrated according to its own forms as deprive those who by French law are entitled to object to the marriage from having an opportunity of objecting. See Trib. Seine, 26th April 1887, Jour. xv. p. 476; C. Besancon, 4th January 1888, Jour. xv. p. 90; and Clunet, Jour. xv. p. 91. This result is justified by reason of the connection which exists in French jurisprudence between this right of objection, which is subject to the personal law, and the form of the celebration on the other. The jurisprudence of Spain, as Torres Campos shows at p. 280, recognises in the fullest sense the lex loci actus. A marriage is always valid, if it is celebrated in the form of the lex loci actus.

³ See, especially, Savigny, § 381; Guthrie, p. 323; Durand, p. 367; Weiss, p. 660. See, too, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Dresden, of 21st June 1845, reported by Seuffert, vol. ii. p. 6, by which a marriage contracted in Belgium between two subjects of Saxony, was held a legal marriage, although the Belgian regulations as to the celebration of marriages before a civil official, and the registration of the same, were not observed; because, although the rule "locus regit actum" is recognised by the practice of the Saxon court, yet the law of Saxony must decide in the case of a legal transaction between two subjects of Saxony, the legal existence of which is recognised by that law, and the legal consequences of which are to be ascertained and fixed for the whole life of the parties interested. For the permissive force as all that can be given to the rule lex loci actus, see in recent times D. R. G. (iii.) 27th January 1887 (Bolze, iv. § 18, p. 6), Vesque v. Pittlingen, § 62.

well. That would, however, contradict Laurent's own theory. Further, it is entirely unhistorical to require absolutely for a marriage some solemn act⁶ before an official charged with such affairs: it is trite that almost the whole world has long recognised the rule consensus facit nuptias.⁷ The official of the State does not, in celebrating a marriage, as Laurent no doubt thinks, exercise an act of sovereignty in the highest sense, but only performs the function of a privileged witness to a solemnity. The true ground, however, of Laurent's theory is his aversion to the religious shape of the ceremony of marriage. If his reasoning is correct, even foreigners could never contract a marriage in the religious form in a country in which the so-called civil marriage is recognised as an imperative form; and in particular, if the marriage ceremony in its unalterable essence and nature requires an actus sollemnis or the co-operation of the State, then neither Frenchmen nor Belgians could ever avail themselves of the religious form⁸ in a foreign country. Hinc illæ lacrimæ. This new theory, which brings Laurent into conflict with other recognised rules of international law, and which, on his authority, has been taken up by others, is calculated to create great confusion, the prejudicial effects of which have already shown themselves in the proceedings of the Institute at Brussels in 1885. We shall return immediately to the question of ecclesiastical forms. We need only in the meantime note, that of course it may seem desirable, from the point of view of the lawgiver who has adopted the principle of a compulsory civil marriage, to put down altogether marriages in facie ecclesiæ, even when these are exclusively confined to foreigners. This result, however, may be attained in a very simple way by a law which forbids clergymen, under a specified penalty, from performing marriages unless they have been preceded by a civil ceremony. Such a penal provision, of the same kind as is contained in the Code pénal, § 199, and in § 67 of the statute of the German Empire dealing with the publication of status, is quite sufficient; whereas the absolute prohibition of ecclesiastical marriages even in other countries may work most prejudicially for the legislator's subjects abroad.

⁶ Two careful judgments in accordance with each other on the same case (C. d'Aix and C. Cass. 8th July 1886, Jour. xiii. 585) are as much opposed to this new theory of solemnity as to the notion that the rule "locus regit actum" has anything more than a merely permissive force. Proof of a marriage between two persons of French nationality was made out by mere private records of it, because at the time of the marriage no registers of such matters were kept at the place where the marriage was celebrated: and, on the other hand, the Court of Cassation expressly declined to take proof as to foreign law, on the ground that the observance of the law of France is all that is required to evidence a marriage and to found a family. A more emphatic rejection of Laurent's entirely capricious theory, the adoption of which would be a calamity for the citizens of all nations that are fond of travel or of enterprise, is hardly conceivable. As against Laurent, see, too, Olivi, Rev. 15, p. 230; but particularly the trenchant criticism of Durand, p. 321, "En un mot il (Laurent) arrive à imposer à tout le monde la loi française. C'est la une source d'insolubles conflits."

⁷ It is recognised in the United States in this sense,—that their jurisprudence does not impose nullity of the marriage as a consequence of the failure to observe the formalities prescribed in any State for the celebration of it; any such nullity must be expressly enacted by the law of that State. See Beach-Lawrence, iii. p. 323; judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, rep. J. v. p. 541. In truth, the rule consensus facit nuptias is recognised. It is noticeable that Dudley Field (§ 548) attributes to this rule an absolutely obligatory force in regard to the marriage ceremony, of course without any demonstration. An author who casts a text-book in the shape of a statute book or code very easily encounters the risk of confusing what he thinks desirable or suitable with what is recognised law. See, too, Field's remark on the transactions of the Institute of International Law, Ann. 1887, 1888, p. 93. On the other hand, see the remark of the president v. Bulmerincq at the same place.

However, it may be noted that the 41st section of the German statute of 6th February 1875, at least in its literal interpretation, and in the meaning which v. Sicherer (Personenstand, p. 346) puts on it, oversteps the limits of the legislative authority conceded by international law to a State.

It runs thus: "Within the German Empire a marriage can only be validly concluded by an official charged with matters of status."

If, then, for instance, marriages without any particular form, or marriages contracted before private witnesses, are recognised as valid by the jurisprudence of the United States, and if two subjects of the States contract within the German Empire an informal marriage, or a marriage before private witnesses, this rule of law, read literally, directs the German judge to declare that marriage invalid, even if the validity of the marriage should be a preliminary question for the decision of some other legal claim, e.g. a claim of succession. That is altogether absurd. The statute, correctly read, must run: "In so far as the validity of a marriage depends on the law of the German Empire, or of one of the States of that empire, it can only be concluded within the empire before an official charged with matters of status."⁹

Finally, the Institute of International Law, in the resolutions taken at Heidelberg in 1887 (cf. Ann. 1887, 1888, p. 101), assigned to the rule "locus regit actum" a compulsory character: this was a perverse proceeding of the same kind, and its object apparently was to force civil marriages upon the subjects of other States. Its effect is, at the same time, to place the subjects of such States as have a sound system of legislation on status, in the most serious predicaments in other countries.¹⁰

⁹ It might have been more shortly expressed thus; "Marriages of German subjects within the German Empire can only be concluded before civil officials." That expression would, however, have made it necessary first to deal with the question whether domicile or nationality was to rule.

¹⁰ The questions were, no doubt, properly stated with reference to the divergent views:—

(1.) "Suffit-il pour qu'un mariage soit valable partout, d'observer les formes du lieu de la célébration?"

(2.) "Est-il nécessaire, pour qu'un mariage soit valable partout, que les formes du lieu de la"

CELEBRATION OF MARRIAGES BEFORE AMBASSADORS OR CONSULS.¹¹

§ 166. That the rule "locus regit actum" has no more than a permissive force, is the only juristic explanation of the validity which is universally conceded to a marriage celebrated by foreigners before their own diplomatic agents or consuls, and according to the forms of their own country,¹² a form of marriage for which provision is frequently made in the statutes¹³ of célébration aient été observées (sauf les exceptions à admettre pour les mariages diplomatiques ou consulaires)?

(3.) "Est-ce qu'un mariage est valable, si les deux parties appartiennent à la même législation et que les formes de cette législation soient observées?"

The first question was quite properly answered in the affirmative; but by answering the second also in the affirmative, and the third in the negative, the legislative sketch previously worked out by the Institute was crippled. It is altogether impossible for any legislator to expose his subjects in a foreign country, as a matter of compulsion, to forms which may be at variance with their religious convictions; and what, again, is to be the result if at the place of celebration the recognised forms are informal marriages, or marriages in facie ecclesie? In that case the view which was in the minds of many members, to force the French civil marriage on the whole world, would certainly not be attained.

In the report given in the Annuaire, p. 101, the legislative sketch under the name "Bar et Brusa" is described as a radical system. Exactly the reverse is the truth. The majority desired to impose Laurent's "acte solennel" in disguise upon the whole world. Can any one really suppose that countries, in which strict forms of celebration in facie ecclesie are still recognised, could be induced to declare a marriage so celebrated by subjects of their own in a foreign country to be null, if no marriage but a civil marriage was recognised at the place of celebration? If, however, you say no to this question, then the resolutions of the Institute bring us to this, that the marriage will be good in the country to which the spouses belong, but bad in all foreign countries. But that result is just what is so undesirable. On the modifications of the Heidelberg resolutions made at the conference at Lausanne in 1888, see the remarks at the close of § 190 of the text.

¹² Thus Weiss, p. 664, very rightly says, "Le droit d'agir des agents diplomatiques et des consuls étrangers repose sur la faculté de leurs nationaux à renoncer au bénéfice de la règle 'locus regit actum' pour revenir à leur loi personnelle."

¹³ See the Code Civ. § 48; "Tout acte de l'état des Français en pays étranger sera valable s'il a été reçu conformément aux lois françaises par les agents diplomatiques ou par les consuls." See, too, a French ordinance of 23rd October 1833, promulgated to carry out this provision. As regards England, see 4 Geo. IV. c. 91, and 12 and 13 Vic. c. 68, and the commentary of Westlake Holtzendorff, §§ 24 and 28; he deals also with the marriages of English soldiers abroad by army chaplains [see also 53 and 54 Vic. c. 47, and 54 and 55 Vic. c. 74, infra, p. 375]. Statute of the German Empire as to proclamation of status, 1875, § 85, and statute of the North German Union (now of the Empire) of 4th May 1870, as to the marriage and proclamation of personal status by subjects abroad. Belgian statute of 24th May 1883 (J. xii. p. 46). Of course, the diplomatic representative or consul must have obtained from his own State the authorisation required by the law of the foreign State to which he is accredited. See, too, the interesting rules by Wharton (J. xiii. pp. 666, 667) on the instructions given to the diplomatic agents of the United States as to marriages. According to these, the consular powers are restricted to cases of necessity, the most important of which are marriages in non-Christian or half-civilised countries, or where there is some other form of compulsoriness to interfere with religious convictions. In all other cases the lex loci actus is to be observed as much as possible.

different States, and which requires for its constitution no sort of recognition in a treaty with the State in which the diplomatic agent or consul lives. For the general recognition of marriages concluded in this way is by no means to be referred to the so-called extra-territoriality of the ambassador's hotel, or of the consular residence.¹⁴ These buildings are not extra-territorial in the sense that they can be regarded as parts of the territory which the ambassador or consul represents. They are subject to the laws, to the jurisdiction, and to the police of the State within the limits of which they lie, and enjoy only certain exemptions and privileges. On the other hand, the possibility of such marriages is not in any way connected with the proper diplomatic character of the agent: the consul need not, in order to celebrate a valid marriage, enjoy the personal privileges of extra-territoriality which belong to an ambassador. Again, as a general rule, the marriage is not good unless both parties belong to the State from which the agent's authority is derived.¹⁵ If the legislation of any State goes beyond this bound, and allows ¹⁶ marriages between a subject of its own and a subject of a foreign country to be celebrated in this way, the matter becomes very serious,¹⁷ especially if it is the husband who belongs to the foreign country, and the marriage, therefore, need not be recognised in the country in which it is to subsist, and on the legislation of which it substantially depends. If the spouses are debarred from availing themselves of the forms which prevail at the place in which they happen to be, on grounds of religion, or because these forms are the forms of some entirely different stage of civilisation, then, if they are at a great distance from their native civilisation, there will be hardly any other course open to them except to submit themselves to a double marriage, one before the envoy or consul of the bridegroom's country, one before the envoy or consul of the bride's. That again leads to difficulties, if the diplomatic representatives of these two States are not to be found in the same place; besides that, the criticism occurs that the matrimonial consent is not declared in a formally binding fashion by both parties simultaneously. If any protracted time intervened between the two declarations, there would be some reason, on general legal principle, for doubting the validity of such a marriage. After these considerations, ¹⁴ As against its connection with extra-territoriality, see Fiore (J. xiii. p. 307). See, too, Calvo, iii. § 799.

Ct. of Austria, 17th August 1880 (Jour. i. p. 71, viii. pp. 84, 171). ¹⁶ As 12 and 13 Vict. c. 68, and § 10 of the statute of the German Empire, of 4th May 1870. But now English diplomatic agents must explain to the parties that they can only count upon the recognition of these mixed marriages within the territory of the British Empire, cf. Fiore, ut sup. [The decision of the Supreme Court of Austria, referred to in the last note, was a case of a marriage between an Austrian subject and an Englishwoman.]

we should be almost inclined to pronounce the view which has been accepted by German legislation, or at least that which has been adopted by the Belgian statute already referred to, to be a good practical solution, if not absolutely correct in theory. By the former, the competency of diplomatic agents is extended to the case where one of the parties is a foreigner; by the latter, to the case where the woman is. Such a view, in order to be recognised, needs, of course, to be positively sanctioned by legislation. In the State which passes such a law, the marriage is at once recognised: it is doubtful whether its validity will ever come to be questioned in another State. However, since positive legislation must in any case be appealed to, the position may perhaps be more satisfactorily settled in the following way. Let us confine ourselves to the more limited rule of the Belgian law, by which the diplomatic agent or consul of the man's country is competent, and let us give the woman a right within a certain time to declare, by an unilateral but formal act, before a notary and witnesses, or before an ambassador or consul of her State of origin, that this marriage, which was celebrated in this way, neither according to the forms of the place of celebration nor those of her national law, is invalid. In other words, let the defects of form be supplemented, as far as the wife is concerned, by her tacit consent, evidenced by the fact that within a certain time she has made no attack upon these informalities. It looks as if a more general international agreement might be reached on such a basis, and that even the native State of the woman might treat such a marriage, which she had not impeached as defective, as completely valid. Without this simple means of releasing herself from the bond of wedlock, which had been tied without the forms of her own country being observed, forms which perhaps constitute an excellent protection to the inexperience of the woman, it would be a serious matter for the State to which the woman belongs, to hold her directly or indirectly to a marriage which had been hastily contracted, and had turned out unhappily. The State could hardly hold out its hand on any other terms to accept a marriage simpliciter, which has not been celebrated according to the forms of the place of celebration, or according to the forms required by the law of the wife, i.e. a marriage which may be an open contravention of its own formal regulations, which in their nature are compulsory upon all its subjects.¹⁸ It is with this view that the sketch, of which mention has already been made which was laid before the Institute in 1885 by Brusa and the author contains as its fourth article the following provision, viz. :—

“Toutefois, dans ce cas, et sauf les effets d'un mariage putatif, l'épouse pourra invalider le mariage dans le délai de deux ans des la célébration.

“L'invalidation se fera par déclaration solennelle devant notaire et témoins ou devant l'autorité diplomatique ou consulaire de l'épouse; elle sortira son effet dès qu'elle sera notifiée au mari ou si la notification n'est pas possible, après quelle aura été publiée en bonne et due form. Les législations régleront cette publication; s'il n'était pas possible de s'entendre sur un règlement général, il suffira d'observer la loi nationale de l'épouse, ou celle du mari ou celle du dernier domicile des deux époux.”

§ 167. We must point out, however, that this power of envoys and consuls to celebrate marriages, in which the wife alone belongs to another State, is by no means without risks of its own. It will supply a means of evading certain restrictive statutes of the country—especially if these import no impedimentum dirimens, but only an impedimentum impediens—in a simple way, and without making it necessary to leave the territory. Such a power should therefore only be given in case of necessity, and should by no means be a general, obvious, and natural method. If we do not limit it in this way, every State will be setting up within its neighbours' territories a number of officials, whose business it will be to open a door for the evasion of the law of the locality.¹⁹ One can hardly believe that any government or State would ever accept such a denial of the principle of territorial sovereignty.²⁰ The legislation of the German Empire, and the Belgian statute, therefore prudently confine themselves to

“Il est désirable d'admettre à titre d'exception et même entre pays chrétiens, la question des capitulations étant réservée, la validité des mariages diplomatiques et consulaires, dans le cas où les deux parties contractantes appartiennent au pays de qui relève la legation ou le consulat.”

This is prudent, but it is not adequate to the necessities of the case, since the cases, in which the parties belong to different States, are not touched. The resolution taken at Brussels in 1885, by which consuls in all countries were to have powers of celebrating marriages, even although the man only belonged to the consul's own country, was altogether untenable.

dealing with the competency of giving such powers to the ambassador or consul. And in the "motifs" of the latter statute (Jour. xii. p. 50) it is expressly said that the power should only be given to envoys and consuls in countries or localities, in which the organisation of the law of personal status does not supply proper guarantees, e.g. in Mohammedan countries, in China, etc., or where there are no forms but religious forms. A more general recognition of the marriages of subjects of different States, before the envoys or consuls of the husband's country, can only be attained, if the wife, who may, in so far as marriage is concerned, be acting without deliberation, is allowed the power of attacking the defects in form within a certain time in some simple way.

MARRIAGE IN A FOREIGN COUNTRY in fraudem legis?

§ 168. Shall a marriage, which has been celebrated in a foreign country in the forms recognised there as binding, be recognised all the world over, and particularly in the country to which the parties belong, if they have betaken themselves on purpose to evade their native law, i.e. in fraudem legis, to that foreign country?

This question becomes of special importance, if, as in the case in the jurisprudence of the United States, we give the lex loci actus a force which shall regulate the capacity of the parties. The more modern jurists of the States, and in particular Wharton (§ 181), are inclined to say that such marriages shall not be recognised, and the same rule seems now to hold in England.²¹ We must assume as beyond all doubt that the native legislation can by express provision declare all marriages, which are concluded abroad in fraudem legis, null; while, on the other hand, a bona fide domicile at the place of celebration, a domicile, the essentials of which will very probably not be closely criticised, will be enough to exclude all challenge on the ground of fraud against the law.

According to the general principle which we have already adopted (cf. § 122), it is thought that there can be no difficulty in holding such marriages valid,²² in so far as the question is really one as to pure forms in the sense we have already explained, § 121. In cases, for instance, in which people have gone to another country, because they can be married there with less expense, or with more speed, or without certain ceremonies which are distasteful to them.

²² Cf. especially the very elaborate reasoning in the judgment of the Supreme Court at Berlin, of 15th January 1855 (Dec. vol. xxix. p. 300).

But in the ceremony of marriage there may be some forms that have a deeper meaning. They may serve to ensure a certain recognition of the wishes of third parties, although the law hesitates to allow these third parties a power of annulling the marriage. For, when the marriage has actually taken place, and the spouses have actually lived together, the consequences cannot be undone, and it would be a serious calamity for the spouses themselves, and possibly for their posterity, if these consequences were to be disregarded, and nullity of the marriage imposed as a penalty. There is thus much to be said for the possibility of acting in fraudem legis in connection with marriage, if the observance of the forms of a foreign country makes it impracticable to plead impediments, which depend on the wishes of third parties. On this account French jurisprudence lays it down that the want of the Actes respectueux, which according to the rules of French law must be paid in certain cases, does not as a rule make a marriage of French persons, which has taken place abroad, a nullity, but that it will have that effect if the French subject has contracted a marriage of set purpose and secretly in another country, under the forms of that other country only, which do not require the Actes respectueux.²³

In spite of this, however, legal logic compels us to pronounce in favour of the view, which regards a marriage, even when it is contracted under these conditions in a foreign country, all the forms of that country being observed, as a valid marriage.²⁴ The legal character of a mere impedimentum impediens is, that it recognises as a fact what has actually taken place: a marriage which has been celebrated in a foreign country, on purpose to evade the restrictions imposed upon it in its own country, belongs to this class of facts. Of course, the legislator (i.e. the legislator of the country to which the parties belong) may expressly declare the nullity of such marriages, because it is too easy for his subjects to avail themselves of the foreign forms, or he may declare them null in certain circumstances. The mistake of any such declaration of nullity, unless it is attached to circumstances and conditions that are easily understood, is very apparent, if we reflect that doubts as to the validity of a marriage may ruin the happiness of entire families. The law of England, therefore, in its measures to put down Gretna Green marriages, laid down plain conditions which should infer nullity.

MARRIAGES in facie ecclesiæ OR BY STATE AUTHORITY.

§ 169. The diversity of different legal theories, as to the forms of celebration of marriage, may perhaps proceed from the fact that in one State marriage is an ecclesiastical matter, and in another it belongs to municipal institutions. Is this any ground for a difference in international treatment? On general principles, the answer to this question must distinctly be in the negative.²⁵

In international law we know no laws but those of States; churches are more universal institutions which have no territorial limitations. If we were to propose to set the law of the individual State on the same line of comparison as the law of the individual church, we should be comparing two things which are entirely incommensurate. In international law we can only regard the ecclesiastical law that is recognised in a State, as part of the law of that State. The result is what we have just stated. In so far as State A, in which marriage is a mere affair of municipal law, is concerned, the ecclesiastical ceremony, which obtains in State B, is a mere affair of municipal law: the clergyman who officiates is, quoad hoc, a civil servant.²⁶ In so far, however, as State B is concerned, where ecclesiastical ceremonies prevail, it is worth while to observe that, according to Catholic as well as Protestant ecclesiastical law, the marriage ceremony was originally not connected with any particular form; matrimonial consent was all that was necessary. If there are, for instance, to take the case of the Catholic Church, districts in which the decree of the Council of Trent, as to the necessity of a ceremony of marriage before the competent clergyman and witnesses, has never been published, then, in so far as ecclesiastical law goes, a marriage may be well contracted without any ceremony at all.^{27 28} If, then, the Church recognises such informal marriages, how much more must a State, whose legislation is no doubt based on that of the Church, recognise informal marriages contracted in another country? and how much more, again, must it recognise marriages in a foreign country, when certain specified forms, although these are not prescribed by the Church but by the State, are observed? The general opinion has long taken this direction.²⁹ In particular, since the Reformers regarded marriage as a civil ordinance, the Protestant Church has no

²⁷ See Richter-Dove, Lehrbuch des Kirchenrechts, 7th ed. § 282, note 23.

reason for looking on a civil marriage contracted in a foreign country as invalid.³⁰

A new element of confusion has been introduced into the subject by Savigny's theory of coercitive law.³¹ A law which requires weddings to be in facie ecclesiae has, thinks Savigny (§ 381, Guthrie, p. 324), a basis in religion and morality. We may concede that, and yet not reach the conclusion he desires, since, as we have already shown, the whole theory of coercitive laws, with its indefinite application, seems to be untenable. And are we to be more strict now than the old theologians and teachers of ecclesiastical law were? How will the interests of morality be better promoted, if, by requiring the observance of formalities of "morality and religion," which frequently cannot be observed at the place where the parties reside, we cast obstacles in the way of persons who desire to marry, or even make it impossible for them to do so, and thus bring serious misfortune upon whole families? Or why should we exalt the importance of these formalities above all reasonable measure?

If a rule of law requiring celebration in facie ecclesiae had that coercitive force, then foreigners who, already married, settle in our country, must be regarded as invalidly married, if their marriage has been a civil ceremony in conformity with the law of the country to which they once belonged. Indeed we could not allow foreigners, who were only temporarily in this country, to live together as man and wife. For a law of such a coercitive character, like the prohibition of slavery, not merely prevents the relation of which it disapproves from coming into existence within its territory, but has the effect of making its continuance impossible.

It is natural that the adherents of a civil marriage (i.e. of the exclusive celebration by some civil officer of the State) should exaggerate the importance of this form. Laurent (iv. § 126) regards this civil marriage, which makes its appearance with the Code Civil, as one of the primitive legal institutions of mankind. Without an acte solennel, marriage is to him no marriage. He thinks also that the subjects of a State, which knows no marriage but one in facie ecclesiae, cannot be married in France by a clergyman of their own church, because he is not a civil official of the French Government. But he proposes in the same way to refuse to citizens of the United States, who by their personal law may contract a marriage without any form at all, the possibility of doing so in France. Durand has supplied us with a trenchant refutation of this fanaticism for civil marriage. He says that Laurent's desire is simply to impose the law of France on the whole world.³² We shall not go wrong if we suppose that in this case, as in others, dislike of the Catholic Church has guided the pen of the famous Belgian jurist. We can only deplore that, as was made plain at the meeting at Brussels in 1885, every one has not paid sufficient attention to Durand's refutation of Laurent's misleading words.³³

³¹ I am sorry to remark that Thöl, § 80, Gerber, § 36, No. 6, Unger, p. 210, are instances in which men have been confused by this new train of reasoning. Olivi (Rev. xv. p. 237) reaches the same result, and in particular this mischievous conclusion, that subjects of a State, which recognises none but an ecclesiastical marriage, can never be married in another State, where none but civil marriages are recognised. He establishes this in a way that is unworthy of a lawyer. A célébration religieuse, he thinks, is a nonsens juridique. But the State to which the parties thus invalidly married belong may regard the marriage as "simple fait," and on this footing force them to go through a marriage in accordance with its own forms. Wherein this power of compulsion consists, and how it is to be worked out if the spouses remain abroad and perhaps die there, Olivi does not say. Even the Spanish Code of 1862, art. 50, which he cites, and which makes sufficient concessions to the Catholic religion and to piety, expresses itself more prudently. It does not say that the marriage is null or a simple fact, but that the spouses must again go through the marriage in facie ecclesiae, if they return to Spain.

NOTE H ON §§ 156-167.

FORM OF THE MARRIAGE CEREMONY, CAPACITY TO MARRY, AND MARRIAGES IN PRESENCE OF AMBASSADORS AND CONSULS.

[The laws of Scotland, England, and America all hold that a marriage celebrated in accordance with the lex loci actus is a valid marriage. But the rule is limited to the case of Christian marriage, and is not to be extended to the case of a ceremony such as is in use among savage or unchristian races. As Lord Brougham remarked in Warrender's case (1835, 2 Cl. and Fin. p. 488), if there are two different things which in two different countries pass under the common name of marriage, the law will not invest the institution of the foreign country, which is essentially different from its own, with the same attributes and effects, merely because of the identity of its name. This doctrine was applied in a case where an Englishman, living in Bechuanaland, had gone through a ceremony with a native woman and lived with her for several years. The ceremony was one that was practised by the savage tribe to which the woman belonged, and did not confer on the woman the same status or rights as are conferred by marriage in Christian countries. It merely recognised her as a chief concubine. The man had not, however, taken any other wives or concubines. The English court, after the man's death, refused to recognise the union as a marriage, to the effect of legitimating offspring (Bethell v. Bethell and Hildyard 1888, L.R. 38 Ch. Div. 220). But in a recent case (Brinkley v.

³³ § 171 of the Code Civil has made this useful practical provision, that marriages of French subjects which have taken place abroad shall be entered upon French registers. On such a matter international arrangements might very well be made. (See Pierantoni's proposition in the Annuaire, viii. p. 77, and art. 3 of the resolutions of the Institute at Lausanne.) The 171st section to which we have referred is, however, a lex imperfecta: it wants the necessary compulsitor on the spouses to make the entry (see on the different theories, Weiss, p. 652).

Att. Gen. 1890, L.R. 15 Prob. Div. 76) it was explained that by the term "Christian marriage" is to be understood not any particular religious ceremony, but a contract, the effect of which is to bind one man to one woman exclusively. Such a ceremony may take place in a heathen country, as in the case in hand, in Japan.

In England, then, the marriage ceremony, if valid according to the lex loci actus, is valid everywhere (Harvey v. Farnie, 1882, L.R. 8, App. Ca. 43). The doctrine has been thus expressed by Lord Campbell in the House of Lords: the forms of entering into a contract of marriage are regulated by the lex loci contractus, the essentials of the contract depend upon the lex domicilii: if these essentials, by which his lordship seems to mean the capacities of the parties, are contrary to the law of the domicile, the marriage, although duly solemnised elsewhere, is void (Brook v. Brook, 1861, 9 Cl. and Fin. 193).

But, on the other hand, in contrast with the author's doctrine, the laws of England and America go so far as to refuse validity to a marriage celebrated in conformity with the forms of the domicile, but at variance with the lex loci actus, unless it has been celebrated in some country the forms of which cannot be observed by Christian people, or in the hotel of the ambassador of the nation to which one of the parties belongs (Westlake, § 17, p. 55, and cases there cited).

The law of Scotland holds that a marriage is well celebrated if celebrated according to the lex loci actus (under the same limitation as to uncivilised countries as exists in England), and Lord Fraser (Husband and Wife, p. 1309) goes so far as to say, "The forms and ceremonies prescribed by the law of the place where the marriage is entered into must be observed; and if they are, the marriage is valid; if they are not, it is invalid, although the ceremonies actually followed were those of the place of domicile." No authority, however, is cited for the proposition that observance of the lex loci actus is imperative, and it is thought that the law of Scotland would not refuse to recognise a marriage celebrated abroad in such a fashion as would suffice to constitute a marriage in Scotland, in cases where both husband and wife were Scots people, i.e. domiciled in Scotland. The law of Scotland requires no form of marriage: it recognises fully that consensus facit matrimonium, and requires nothing more than trustworthy evidence of the interchange of that consent. That evidence may either be supplied by regular certificates of marriage or the testimony of witnesses, or may be rested on presumptions, derived either from the cohabitation of the man and woman with the habit and repute of married persons, or from a promise of marriage formed by copula. The last method requires a declarator of a competent court, and does not, with absence of such declarator, per se constitute marriage. The marriage contract being in Scotland so purely a matter of consent, and so entirely independent of form, it would seem, with all deference to Lord Fraser's authority, to savour of absurdity to hold that Scots persons must, if they desire to enter into their contract abroad, go through the forms prescribed by the law of the foreign country. Is it to be said that, while the interchange of consent openly before witnesses in Edinburgh will constitute a marriage, the same consent cannot be interchanged before the same witnesses in Paris, and that the Scots court will refuse to uphold the same contract proved in the same way? Lord Fraser cites no authority in support of his dictum, and principle seems to be against it.

In further illustration of the same point, one may enquire whether, in the case of a marriage proved by the cohabitation of the man and woman with the habit and repute of married persons, that cohabitation must be in Scotland, and whether evidence of such cohabitation had in another country will be rejected. If Lord Fraser's doctrine is correct, the whole course of life, which is to be adduced to prove the existence of a marriage, would have to be in Scotland, and evidence of the same kind of life abroad would be inadmissible. But we find, in the case of the Countess of Strathmore (1750, Elchies Vocc. Proof, and Paton, 6 H. of L. 684), that proof was allowed of cohabitation in Holland as man and wife, in an action of declarator of marriage, and the President of the Court (Dundas) referred to two precedents in which proof of cohabitation in countries other than Scotland had been allowed. No doubt, in these cases, the matter that was sent to proof was the conduct of the parties, which was said to be evidence of a consent previously interchanged in Scotland. But the final question to be settled in such cases must always be, was there consent? If there was, the consenting parties are married, and geographical or political boundaries cannot alter this fact. The law of one country may draw a different inference from the fact of consent from what the law of another country does: one law will say it makes marriage, another will say that no one shall be held to so permanent and important a contract as marriage without some more solemn ceremonial. Now, in the case supposed, the Scots courts are to consider whether a consent was given: they find sufficient evidence of that fact. They must then hold that the parties, both of whom are, ex hypothesi, Scots, consented to be married, i.e. made a contract to that effect. Any other contract so entered into would be valid if it accorded with Scots forms. Why should this contract, proved as the law of Scotland requires it to be proved, not receive effect? A Scotsman is surely not to be allowed to break his contract, of which there is ample evidence, because he made the engagement which constitutes it in another country. If there is insufficient evidence of consent—and part of this evidence might, no doubt, consist in proof of his knowledge of the forms of the foreign law, and of their accessibility and his deliberate rejection of them—then there is no contract, and no marriage. But, given proof of the consensus, the fact of its being given in another country, does not seem sufficient to warrant repudiation of it in Scotland.

The same kind of proof that was allowed in the Strathmore case, i.e. of residence abroad as man and wife, was allowed in the case of Napier v. Napier (1801, Hume's Reps. 367), although there, after consideration, it was rejected as insufficient to prove habit and repute. Again, in the Breadalbane Peerage Case (Campbell v. Campbell, 1867, Ct. of Sess. Reps.

3rd ser. vol. v. (House of Lords), p. 115), proof was led and considered as to cohabitation in England.

Under another class of marriages, viz. marriages inferred or presumed from a promise of marriage subsequente copula, the same reasoning would apply, and is put by Lord Westbury in the case of Longworth v. Yelverton (Ct. of Sess. Reps. 3rd ser. vol. ii. (House of Lords), p. 49, Lord Westbury, at p. 67). In that case it was held that it was necessary for the pursuer to show that both the promise and the copula took place in Scotland, but that was because the pursuer was an Englishwoman and the defender an Irishman, the law of Scotland being therefore invoked as the lex loci contractus. That being so, the whole transaction must necessarily take place in Scotland. The decision would have no application to the case of two Scots persons.

Just as the law of the domicile may be observed by Christians in a heathen country, the courts of the United States have recognised the validity of a marriage celebrated between two Indians in Missouri according to Indian customs, under the superintendence of an agent of the United States Government (Boyer v. Dively, 58 Miss. 510).

Scotland and the United States determine all questions as to the capacity of the parties by the lex loci contractus, and that even although the parties may have resorted to the country where the marriage is celebrated for the express purpose of evading the restrictive laws of their domicile (Fraser, 1300, 1301). England, on the other hand, regards the capacity of the parties as a matter to be ruled by their personal law, i.e. the law of their domicile, and has refused to sanction an English marriage between Portuguese subjects who were first-cousins, and therefore by the law of Portugal incapable of marriage. This decision was pronounced by the Court of Appeal reversing a judgment of Sir R. Phillimore (Sottomayor v. Barios, 1877, 3 P. D. 1). The principle seems to be that quoted above as enunciated by Lord Campbell in Brook's case, viz. that for the essentials of the marriage you must look to the law of the domicile. But where some requirement which is demanded by the law of the domicile as a mere impedimentum impediens is unsatisfied, the result is otherwise. Thus the courts of England have recognised Gretna Green marriages between English subjects without the preliminaries required in England, and have also recognised a marriage in England between French subjects without the consent of their parents, an omission which would be fatal to its validity in France (Simonin v. Mallac, 1860, 2 S. and T. 67, and 29 L. J. Mat. 97). This decision is reconciled with that pronounced in the case of Sottomayor, by holding the consent of parents to be part of the ceremony, and not a matter affecting the capacity of the parties.

Belgium and France require in certain circumstances publication and registration of marriages, and the performance of what are known as actes respectueux. The English courts have recognised marriages of French people without observance of these requirements (Simonin v. Mallac, ut sup.), just as they had recognised Gretna Green marriages. But the French courts, although they do not pronounce such marriages void, hold that they are, in the discretion of the court, voidable (Cibeins, 1886, J. xiii. p. 334; Cruyppenine, 1890, J. xvii. p. 487; see, also, J. xiv. p. 475, xv. p. 90, and xvi. p. 641).

If the marriage has been celebrated abroad in fraudem legis domesticæ, and in order to avoid publicity, then it will be annulled (d'Alinegro v. Louis, 1876, J. iv. 43, d'Imécourt v. Musurus Bey, 1882, J. ix. p. 308). If false representations be made to the authorities of the country where the marriage takes place, this will raise a presumption of nullity, as being proof of a desire for secrecy (Berthaut, 1879, J. vi. 486). On the other hand, where there is no evidence of a desire for secrecy, where, for instance, parties contract marriage abroad to avoid the delays consequent on publication, being desirous of emigrating to America speedily, or where parties are resident in Brazil, and have no opportunity of observing French forms, while their conduct shows an absence of any desire for concealment (Paumier v. Jouard, 1879, J. vi. p. 281), and generally, where there is bona fides, the marriage so informally celebrated secundum legem loci contractus will be allowed to stand (Desaye v. Clement, C. de Cass. 1880, J. ix. p. 85; Lebon, 1879, J. ix. p. 205). For instance, where the parties have lived openly as husband and wife, neither they nor their parents can attack the marriage, even although it has been celebrated abroad in fraudem legis (Rouet, 1886, J. xiv. p. 66): acquiescence by the parents will import consent, and will bar one of the spouses from founding on the absence of it (Bonné, 1883, J. xi. p. 67). The omission of the actes respectueux cannot be pleaded by collaterals (Goux, 1881, J. ix. p. 531). The want of registration and publication, as required by French law, can only be pleaded by third parties who have an interest in reducing the marriage: a husband who has lived with his wife as if they were married persons cannot plead this, his own fault or fraud (Bonné ut sup.; Gouzène, 1881, J. ix. 534; Beaufils, 1877, J. v. 43).

That the fiction of the ambassador's hotel being part of the territory of his country is not carried to its legitimate conclusions, is proved by the judgments of the courts of Austria and of France, to the effect that marriages celebrated between natives of the country to which the ambassador is accredited, or between one native of that country and a woman of the same nationality as the ambassador, in the chapel of the embassy, according to the forms of the ambassador's country, are not recognised as valid, although if they had really been celebrated in his territory they would have been recognised. An Austrian married an Englishwoman in English form in the chapel of the English embassy in Vienna; that marriage was held null by the Supreme Court of Austria, 17th August 1880 (J. viii. 171), and similarly a marriage between two French people, in the hotel of a foreign ambassador, was held null by the Tribunal de la Seine, 2nd July 1872. (The judgment is given at length by Fraser, Husband and Wife, p. 1539; see also J. i. p. 71. The same judgment was repeated by a French court, 1889, J. xvi. p. 836.)

No doubt English courts have held that marriages celebrated in the residence of an ambassador of England, where only one of the parties is English, are valid, and that has been by the legislature declared to be the law in cases where a marriage is celebrated between a foreigner and a British subject before a British consul duly authorised to perform such marriages (4 Geo. IV. c. 91, expounded by Dr Lushington, in Lloyd v. Petitjean, 1839, 2 Curteis, 251; see also 12 and 13 Vict. c. 68, and 31 and 32 Vict. c. 61); but a statute of the British Parliament can never make these marriages valid in the country where they are celebrated, and the necessity of passing statutes to legalise them in England is an additional indication that the fiction of the ambassador's house being the territory of his country is not internationally accepted as sound. The result of these statutes is that a marriage, which is good in England, will not be recognised anywhere else. (See Dr Lushington's opinion, ut supra.) By a statute of 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. c. 47), it is declared (§ 1) that marriages celebrated in the houses of British ambassadors abroad, "between parties of whom one at least is a British subject," shall be as valid as if celebrated in the United Kingdom. By the 4th section the same declaration is made as to similar marriages celebrated on board a Queen's ship on a foreign station. The remark just made on the old statutes applies equally to the provisions of this Act, viz. that the result is that such marriages will be good in England and nowhere else. By the 9th section it is provided that Her Majesty may prohibit or restrict the exercise of the powers conferred by the Act or the previous Acts on ambassadors, etc., "where the exercise of these powers appears to Her Majesty to be inconsistent with international law or the comity of nations, or in places where, in the opinion of Her Majesty, sufficient facilities exist without the exercise of those powers for the solemnization of marriages to which any British subject is a party."

Another statute was passed in 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. c. 74) to regulate marriages celebrated by British ambassadors and consuls abroad, and contains various provisions to ensure the bona fides of the parties, and to prevent any abuse of the power of these officers. Inter alia, by § 8 an official shall not be required to solemnise a marriage, if he thinks that to do so would be inconsistent with international law or the comity of nations. His refusal, however, may be reviewed by the Secretary of State on appeal.]

C. DECLARATORS OF NULLITY.

§ 170. It is plain that, if an action is raised for annulling a marriage, an offence against the law of any of the States concerned will warrant decree, just exactly according as the observance of that law was necessary for the constitution or existence of the marriage.¹ Impediments, therefore, of a resolute character are always good grounds for annulling the marriage, if the law of the country to which the husband belongs affirms their existence in the particular case. But if it is only the law of the wife's country which so describes the facts of the case, then there is not, according to the view I have adopted, good ground in every case for a declarator of nullity.² We must remember that by the law of the United States, a scientific partisan of which, remarkably enough, is now to be found in Switzerland³ in the person of König,⁴ an action for annulling a marriage can only be raised on a plea of nullity which is recognised as sound, not only by the law of the country to which the spouses belong, but by that of the country where the wedding took place.⁵

² It is, besides, to be noticed that the action for setting the marriage aside can, as a rule, only be instituted in the courts of the country to which the spouses belong, or to which the husband belongs (see post discussion on the competency of the courts). Since the question will generally be one as to the right to plead some alleged impediment to marriage in such an action, the view by which the lex fori is the only law that can be applied comes to the same result as we have reached in the text. Most authors have no special discussion of the subject of actions of nullity; they speak only of actions of divorce.

⁵ A peculiar case was decided on 12th February 1882, by the Supreme Court of Illinois (Madelaine Roth v. Ehnmann et al.). R, a subject of Würtemberg, married Madelaine Roth in 1855 in Chicago; the spouses afterwards returned to Europe, and lived together as man and wife in Würtemberg. In 1873 the marriage was declared null at the husband's instance in Würtemberg, on the ground that it had been concluded without the man having obtained a special permission to be married abroad, which was at that time, by an ordinance of 1808, the law of Würtemberg. R married on 27th November 1873 Amalie S., and on 28th March 1874 concluded a marriage contract with her, on the lines generally of a community of goods during their joint lives, the longest liver to enjoy all, except certain provisions to children and a few legacies. R died in 1876, leaving a considerable landed estate in Illinois. Madelaine, the first wife, claimed, as lawful widow of the deceased, a share of this estate in the courts of Illinois. Since the first marriage was undoubtedly good by the law of the place of celebration, she maintained the invalidity of the decree of nullity, at least in Illinois.

The Supreme Court of Illinois refused her claim, because the spouses at the time of the decree of nullity were by force of their domicile subject to the courts and to the law of Würtemberg, and therefore the decree, as one affecting their status, must be valid all the world over. Two judges however, dissented, and Justice Walker laid down that the Court of Würtemberg had no jurisdiction to declare null a contract concluded under the law of another country, i.e. the first marriage: that the judgment of the Court of Würtemberg was directly counter to the law of America; if it were to be recognised, the result would be that a statute of Würtemberg could provide cum effectu that subjects of Würtemberg could not acquire land in America without permission of their own sovereign. (Pamphlet published at Chicago, Beach Barnard 1882. I have to thank the kindness of Messrs Rosenthal & Pence for bringing it under my notice.)

In one respect we must certainly concur with the judgment: it is not the courts of the

If this proposition, or anything like it, were really to become international law in Europe, the smallest of the European States would have it in its power to render the matrimonial legislation of all the Great Powers a mockery, by introducing some lax legislation of its own; or at least would enable anyone who could pay for an excursion or return ticket, and the charges of a stay of a few weeks or months on its territory, to set his own law at defiance. An international matrimonial office might be set up at Monaco, just as there now exists there an International Gambling Bank.⁶

It is very proper that jurisprudence should strive to lay down, as far as possible, principles which can carry the motto "hic et ubique," that is to say, we should, as far as possible, avoid the melancholy predicament that one and the same marriage is valid by the law of one State, and invalid by the law of another, perhaps an adjoining, State. With this end in view, one is inclined to recommend to the legislation of each State a [certain measure of concession, or, as one might say, a rounding off of the corners of its own system, in the case where a marriage has been concluded abroad, and has substantially to subsist abroad. This consideration was at the bottom of the sketch which Brusa and I laid before the Institute of International Law in 1885, especially in so far as it dealt with impediments to marriage existing by the law of the wife's country. But there is a long way between this and the recognition of a territory for international marriages, within which each and every kind of marriage, which is forbidden elsewhere, abductions, etc., may be legalised, so that the native State of the spouses, or the State in which they are for the future to live, will have to accept the most open neglect and contempt of its laws. I cannot believe that it would prosper, and I doubt if the Great Powers of Europe would be inclined to tolerate the sovereignty of every little State that chose to take up this position.⁷

D. BETROTHAL.

§ 171. It results, from the same reasoning as proves that the personal country in which the disputed marriage took place that are competent to pronounce decree of nullity, but those of the State to which the spouses belong at the date of the action. They have subjected themselves to these latter.

⁶ My respected colleague König certainly did not fully consider the perils to European States which would arise from his system.

law of the husband should be the legal test of marriage, that betrothal, which does not subject the woman to the personal statute of the man, and under which both parties still face each other with full rights the one against the other, must be tested by the personal law of both.¹

It is only in so far as the form of the betrothal is concerned, that the rule "locus regit actum" is to be applied, and it is obvious that the judge must reject any suit founded on a betrothal, which is regarded by the law of his country as improper or indecent.² But it does not at all follow that betrothals generally are subject to the law that prevails at the seat of the court.³ This cannot be deduced from the attribution of a coercitive character to the law that prevails there. The application of the rule "locus regit actum," is, in the case of a betrothal⁴ above all other cases,

¹ If, therefore, there is a case of a real conflict of law, the decision must be in the defender's favour. E.g. suppose that by the bridegroom's personal law the betrothal is invalid, but valid by that of the bride. If either raises a process, founding on the betrothal, the action must be dismissed. Cf. Duplessis, Consult. 20 (Œuvres, ii. p. 115). See judgment of the Supreme Court at Stuttgart, 28th June 1853 (Seuffert, vi. § 306). "By the provisions of the marriage law of Würtemberg, a valid betrothal can only be dissolved by a sentence of the Consistorial Court; this provision is a law of a positive coercitive character, resting on reasons of morality, from which a woman, who, as a native of Würtemberg, is bound by it, cannot withdraw herself, on the ground that she has entered into a contract of betrothal with a foreigner, with a view to carrying out her contract in another country." See, too, Ct. of the Empire, iv. 2nd March 1885; same Ct. 7th July 1887; and Ct. of the Empire, ii. 21st October 1887 (Bolze, Praxis, i. § 43, v. § 10); the bridegroom lived in the territory of the common law, the bride in the territory of the Prussian Allgem-Landr. The Prussian Landr. is not, as a matter of course, held decisive of the question, whether the bridegroom can sue for damages, apart from any question of form which must be settled by the common law; the point to be settled rather is, to what law did the parties intend to subject themselves? (This form of expression seems innocent.) It is at the same time, says the judgment, to be taken into account in what country the marriage was intended to be celebrated (carried out?).

³ Unger, p. 192, is of a different opinion.

⁴ A judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Celle, on 3rd February 1816 (Seuffert, v. No. 36), proceeds on the opposite theory. By the legal system of the Principality of Calenberg in Hanover, in matters of marriage and betrothal, of date 5-16th January 1733, it is necessary, to constitute a contract of betrothal that can be sued upon, that it should be preceded by the sanction of the parents on both sides, or of the grandparents or guardians, as the case may be, and that the betrothal should take place before two persons of repute, of whom one, in country places, is to be the clergyman of the locality. The judgment referred to lays down that the legality of betrothals of inhabitants of Calenberg is to be tested by the rules of that system of law, as positive rules, even in cases in which the betrothal takes place in another country, and the marriage is intended to subsist in another country. See, on the other hand, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Wolfenbüttel, of 8th March 1858 (Zeitschrift für Rechtspflege im Herzogthum Braunschweig 1859, No. 2, p. 28), which applies the rule "locus regit actum" to a betrothal of a Brunswicker and a foreign woman in a foreign country, and declares it good, although the law of Brunswick has special forms for betrothal, with requirements of its own, which must be observed, and the omission of which is threatened with punishment; and these ceremonies were of course omitted in this case. See, too, Court of the Empire, iv. 4th March 1885 (Bolze, Prax. i. § 43, p. 10). See, too, an interesting judgment of Ger. Imp. Ct. (ii.), of 27th October 1887 (Dec. xx. p. 333), by which the law of the place of the intended domicile of the marriage is held to be regulative, as being the true place for the fulfilment of the promise which has been given.

imperative, unless good faith and confidence are to be wantonly abused.^{5 6 7}

E. PERSONAL RELATIONS OF THE SPOUSES DURING MARRIAGE.

§ 172. No one will doubt that the personal relations of the spouses must be determined, while the marriage lasts, by the national law of the husband.¹ A change of nationality, or of domicile, as the case may be, gives rise at once to the rule of another law.² We cannot look at the matter as if it were a mere contract, although no doubt the entering into a marriage is a kind of contract. The parties may marry or not, as they please: so far they are free: but if they do marry, they are not free to adopt some of the consequences of the married relation, and reject others; the law itself, in truth, determines these consequences directly, and it certainly desires that the marriages of all who are its permanent subjects shall be regulated by its own provisions, irrespective of whether the parties may have at some past time belonged to some other State and its law.

What I have just said applies to the capacity of the wife to act, which is variously dealt with in different legal systems, applies to her capacity to sue without her husband's concurrence, to the possibility of her being invested with a general power to that effect by her husband (Codice civ. Italiano, art. 134), etc. There can be no doubt that this is so in cases in which the national (or domiciliary) law, differing from the law of the transaction in question, gives the wife wider powers.³ But it is also the law, as the general consensus of opinion on the Continent of Europe rightly holds, in the converse case, where a wider capacity is accorded to her by the law of the place of the transaction than she enjoys by her domestic law.⁴

We must however remark, in the first place, that the husband can only put in force any measures of personal constraint upon his wife, in so far as the law of the place of residence will allow. If, for instance, their domestic law allows him to lock her up, or to do so under certain conditions, he does not enjoy this power, if it does not exist by the law of the place of the wife's residence at the time. If our law forbids such a measure of force, and sets a higher value on personal liberty, it will regard force of that character as contra bonos mores, and our legal system can never hold out its hand to realise, what it regards as contra bonos mores or degrading.⁵ On the other hand, however, a husband can never claim a higher right of compulsion over his wife, than his personal law gives him. If his personal law regards the married life rather as an affair of freedom and of good manners, the system of law of the place of residence has no reason for introducing, in the shape of constraint, a new element into the married life of two foreigners; and all the less can it do so, as even by its own provisions it is left to the humour of the spouses to introduce that element into their life or not.⁶

⁵ The law of betrothal is often passed over in expositions of private international law. Stobbe, § 34, note 1, agrees with the text.

⁶ An action for solemnisation of the marriage is only competent if the betrothal has this effect both by the lex fori and by the domestic law of both spouses. Stobbe, § 34, 1, and Muheim, p. 183, speak only of the lex domicilii of the defender, and of the lex fori. But if the pursuer is, in any case you like to take, not himself bound, the defender cannot be.

⁷ On the import of betrothals in Germany, there is a gross error in Beach-Lawrence, p. 306.

The second remark we have to make is, that whatever the law of the place of residence regards as the bounden duty of mankind as between spouses, must be recognised by them, so long as that residence endures, irrespective of any different rule laid down by their personal law. This rule is specially to be kept in view in questions as to aliment. If a man was released from his obligation to maintain his wife, because his personal law knew of no such obligation, or ignored it in the particular circumstances of the case, a foreign wife would now and again require to be supported at the expense of the poor's box.⁷ It is true that this obligation ceases so soon as the husband quits the territory. But, on the other hand, the measure of it, where it does exist, is at the least the extent to which the personal law of the husband recognises it.⁸ There is no ground on which the law of the place of residence should hinder the operation of a more extensive duty of support sanctioned by his personal law.

NOTE I ON § 172. PERSONAL RELATIONS OF THE SPOUSES.

[The French courts hold that the personal relations of the spouses are determined by the law of the husband's domicile (Caro v. Caro, 1875, Jour. iii. p. 182). In other judgments there had been a question whether the law of the husband's nationality or that of his domicile should prevail in such matters (Bronski v. Bronski, 1876, Jour. iv. p. 237); but the final decision, and the law accepted at present, is in favour of the law of the domicile, and an exception is made to the ordinary French rules of jurisdiction, by which suits between foreigners are not entertained, so that a wife can sue in France upon personal rights given her by French

⁶ Laurent, v. p. 113; Weiss, p. 672.

⁷ Laurent, v. p. 185, takes a different view; Brocher, i. p. 297; Olivi, Rev. xvii. p. 55. See on the other hand, and in agreement with the text, Aubry et Rau, i. p. 82; Fiore, § 109; Weiss, p. 677. Thus the courts of a country in which a foreigner is residing are competent to decern against him for aliment. Trib. Seine, 31st August 1878; C. Paris, 3rd August 1878 (Jour. vi. p. 66), agrees with our conclusions. Clunet (Jour. vi. p. 67) has very sound observations on this point.

law, where there has been an intention of making a home in France, that intention being indicated by the establishment of a business in France (Camous v. Ghisla, 1878, Jour. v. p. 610). In that case the place of the matrimonial domicile was held to determine all the personal relations of the spouses; and in the later case of Kowalski v. Kowalski (1879, Trib. Civ. de la Seine, Jour. vi. p. 550), in which the husband was by nationality a Pole, the same inference—viz. of an intention to submit the regulation of their rights to French law by making France the home of the marriage—was drawn from the facts of a French marriage to a French wife, a French marriage-contract, and a residence in France, and jurisdiction was accordingly exercised by the court to determine the husband's liability for aliment. Equity has established in such cases a legal category of matrimonial domicile, so much invoked in cases of divorce both in Scotland and the Continent, to do justice between parties who might otherwise find their rights indefinite, and the remedy for infringement of them beyond their reach. (Cf. infra, p. 399 et seq.)

In the law of England (Westlake, p. 61) and in that of Scotland (Fraser, p. 1318) the personal relations of the spouses must be determined by the law of the forum, in so far at least as such rights are of the description dealt with in the text. According to Story, § 198, the domicile of the marriage, or, if that is not clear, the domicile of the husband will rule. The result in practice will probably be found to coincide pretty much with the doctrine of the text, because wives claiming aliment or demanding protection will resort to the forum of the place of residence, while these courts will not determine any question of rights so as permanently to affect the marriage relations unless they have jurisdiction ratione domicilii.]

F. DIVORCE.

§ 173. Divorce, and that permanent judicial separation, which in many respects is equivalent to it, recognised by those systems of law which have no real divorce to the effect of completely dissolving the marriage tie, are subject to the national law, or the law of the domicile of the spouses. It can never be the purpose of any system of law to determine whether a marriage subsisting between foreigners is dissoluble, or to say on what conditions it may be dissolved.¹ But while the law of any country where an action is brought may refuse to pronounce a divorce as contrary to morality, if it be asked to do so upon grounds which it pronounces to be inadmissible, so, conversely, every ground of divorce which the law of the country approves must be unconditionally applied by the judge who has cognisance of the case, since the maintenance of the marriage tie, in spite of these grounds for separation, must be held to be just as much an offence against morality.² This conflict, according to which the law of the nationality or domicile would be applied on the one hand, while the lex fori is applied on the other, is solved by the consideration,³ that in actions of divorce—unless there is some express enactment to the contrary—the judge of the domicile or the nationality is the only competent judge,⁴ while we cannot allow the parties the option of submitting themselves to the law and to the courts of another country, since it is not in their power to deal as they please with the relation which is the subject of the action.⁵ A decree of divorce, therefore, pronounced by

³ Cf. Durand, § 175; Bard, § 147; v. Martens, § 72, who, however, under note 9b, makes an exception of which we shall take notice.

any other judge than a judge of the domicile or nationality, is to be regarded in all other countries as inoperative.⁶ If a different view were to Deutsche Processordnung, which declares the German Court of the domicile competent for foreign spouses. The revised statutes of Massachusetts of 1835, chap. lxxvi. §§ 9, 10, 11, declare that their courts shall on no account pronounce decree of divorce, unless the parties have lived together in Massachusetts as married persons. Further, no divorce shall be entertained by reason of any circumstances that have taken place in another country, unless the parties have lived together in Massachusetts as husband and wife before their occurrence, or unless one of them at the time of the occurrence of such circumstances was living in Massachusetts. By the 39th section, a divorce obtained in some other State by an inhabitant of Massachusetts, on the ground of some fact which took place in Massachusetts, and while the spouses were living there, is invalid, if the said fact would not be ground for a divorce by the law of Massachusetts. The statute of 1843, cap. 47, provides that decree of divorce may be pronounced on account of facts that have taken place in a foreign State, if the pursuer has resided for five years in Massachusetts before raising his action, Story, p. 257, note 1. Westlake Holtzendorff, § 39; Piggot, p. 280. (The application of the lex domicilii and the exclusive competency of the judex domicilii are the doctrines of modern English law.) Olivecrona (J. x. p. 359) holds that the courts of Sweden are competent to divorce foreigners who have been married in Sweden, because the law of Sweden looks upon the marriage as a contract guaranteed by the State. Olivecrona, however, likewise reports that the king in council has lately (16th December 1881) declared himself to have no such jurisdiction. Validity of a decree of divorce of an Austrian couple pronounced by a foreign judex domicilii at Berlin, affirmed by the Probate Division of the English High Court of Justice, 2nd July 1881, J. xv. p. 277 [Ingham v. Sachs, R. 56, L. T. 920]; see Pittlingen, § 59, Oesterreichisches Hofdecret, 23rd January 1801; see, too, Savigny as cited. This principle is in no way transgressed if a different tribunal from that of the domicile is declared to be competent within the territory of the same State, that State having one system of marriage law. The other principles which regulate the operation of decrees pronounced abroad are excluded from consideration here.

⁶ Judgment of the Cour d'Appel de Paris, 11th February 1808 (Sirey, viii. 2, p. 86). Trib. Seine, 7th February 1882 (J. ix. p. 89), Féraud-Giraud (J. xii. p. 248) declares in favour of the competency of the French courts, if the foreign spouses have acquired an authorised domicile in France. But in our view the incompetency of non-national tribunals does not rest on the fact that the spouses have no droits civils, but rather on the proposition that the regulation of family relations is exclusively an affair for the national law and national tribunals of the spouses. Laurent (iv. § 56 et seq. particularly § 60) says that the courts of Belgium hold themselves competent, if the spouses have their domicile there. He defends this manfully against the entirely different view which prevails in French law, and mainly on the ground that the Belgian courts would not put into execution any judgment pronounced in another country, which is the State to which the spouses belong: as Belgian courts will not recognise such decrees, there would, he argues, be a real denial of justice if they referred suitors to these foreign courts. This argument seems to result in curing one error of Belgian law by committing another. The sentence of divorce is by French law recognised as a declaration of personal status, and needs therefore no special declaration to render it executory in France, if it is pronounced by the courts of the country to which the parties belong. The alleged denial of justice does not take place. See Trib. Civ. Liège, 13th June 1885 (J. xiv. p. 491), in harmony with Laurent. This judgment, as a matter of principle, applies the national law of the parties to test the grounds for divorce. See Burge, i. p. 690, who says: "It seems scarcely compatible with the respect which States owe and render to the laws of each other, that the tribunals of one should afford assistance to the subject of another State in withdrawing himself from the operation of a law which is obligatory on him. Nor is it required by any considerations for the supremacy of its own laws, that such assistance should be afforded." The courts of the different States of the Union in America refuse to recognise decrees of divorce pronounced in other States, if the parties were not domiciled there, Burge, i. pp. 691-693; Story, § 229a; Wharton, ut cit. The statute of Massachusetts cited in the last note makes that special provision.

The Courts of Scotland, whose practice has varied, have in some cases held that they had be taken, the subjects of a State could easily defeat the law by which they are absolutely bound.^{7 8}

On the other hand, the place in which the marriage was celebrated is of no importance.⁹ The other view,¹⁰ which proposed that the law of that place should rule, held divorce to be a contract right of the spouses. If this opinion were correct, no law to regulate divorce could apply to marriages contracted before its promulgation.¹¹ But marriage, although it rests upon the intention of private parties, is a part of jus publicum, and the spouses are absolutely subject to the jus publicum of the place in which they are domiciled.

From this the next step is, that the nationality or domicile of the spouses at the date of the action, and not that at the date of the marriage, or of the event on account of which divorce is sought, must rule.^{12 13} Some English judges [once] contended that a marriage concluded in England could only be dissolved by English law; in later times, however, there seems to be an inclination rather to take the view that the acquisition of jurisdiction although the parties were not domiciled in Scotland—they have been inclined to regard a mere temporary residence as sufficient. The argument specially urged in favour of this view, that residence in any country gives right to the protection of the law and the courts of that country, can never, considering the really permanent character of marriage, give jurisdiction to sever this enduring relation definitely, but merely confers power to separate the spouses temporarily, by provisional regulations, with a view, for instance, to protect the wife against the cruelty of her husband. [Scots law goes no further, see below, p. 399 et seq.] See Gand, No. 424; judgment of the C. de Cass. 27th November 1822 (Sirey, xxiv. i. pp. 48-52). There is just as little reason for referring to the event on which the action proceeds. No doubt some grounds for divorce, such as adultery, may be held to be delicts also; but the question whether these acts can dissolve the marriage, is quite distinct from the question by what law the delict is to be judged, Burge, p. 680. [For the present state of Scots law on this subject, see note at the end of paragraph 180, p. 399.]

⁹ A peculiar principle obtains in the Argentine Republic. The law of the Catholic Church, which does not permit divorce, is there recognised as being absolute to such an extent, that a decree of divorce pronounced at the home of both spouses will not be recognised, if one of them subsequently comes to the Argentine Republic. But, on the other hand, so much respect is paid to the sovereignty of the lex loci actus, that if the law of the place where the marriage took place permits divorce and the re-marriage of the parties to other persons, this rule is recognised in the Argentine Republic.

By a judgment of the Trib. de Brux. 12th May 1877 (see Rev. xiii. p. 61), the wife of one who by naturalisation has become a Belgian, cannot found on the fact that by the law of the country to which she formally belonged divorce is not recognised.

a bona fide domicile¹⁴ in the country where divorce is sought is necessary, and is all that is necessary.¹⁵

The place, too, in which the act which is said to constitute the ground of divorce was committed, is, as we think, of just as little consequence.¹⁶ We are not here concerned with any question of criminal law, but with an alteration of personal status.¹⁷ If, then, something took place which is no ground for divorce by the personal law of the spouses at the time, but is a ground for it by a personal law which they afterwards acquire, and if the thing which took place had no continued existence, happened once for all—if, for instance, by the earlier law simple adultery by the husband is not a ground on which the wife can sue for divorce, but must be accompanied by some other qualification (Code Civ. 230),¹⁸ while by their subsequent law simple adultery is enough—a change of nationality [or domicile] cannot elevate to the rank of a ground for divorce the circumstance which took place under the dominion of the former law. We may say that if the spouse must put up with this conduct, without being able to raise an action of divorce, it is regarded, so far as the marriage is concerned, as non-existent.¹⁹

Reps. 4th ser. p. 115, the doctrine that a wife's domicile follows that of her husband is affirmed for all cases, except, perhaps, where the spouses are judicially separated. See supra, pp. 117, 118, and notes.] See Hingst, Rev. xiii. p. 411.

she does not actually follow her husband to his new residence animo remanendi.²¹ The fact upon which she founds gives her a right to dissolve the marriage, and at the same time a right to choose a special residence for herself. The former right depends, however, upon the latter, and thus, if she should follow her husband to his new residence, the law of that country will rule her rights also.²² If the wife is refused this privilege, then the husband will be able at his pleasure to put an end to any just claim for divorce.²³

What are we to say, however, to the case where one spouse only obtains naturalisation in a foreign country, and has himself divorced there? If, as is the case in France, the law does not provide that the naturalisation of the husband affects the wife ipso jure, such cases will occur not unfrequently. Laurent (v. § 147) thinks that such a conflict, supposing that the personal law of the other spouse does not allow divorce on the same conditions, is, from the point of view of positive law, insoluble. He thinks, however, that the State to which the one spouse has gone over, must give him or her a divorce with all its consequences, and as a matter of fact judgments to this effect have been pronounced both by the courts of first instance and by the Appeal Court at Brussels (12th May and 31st Dec. 1877, J. v. p. 513). Opinions to the opposite effect are given by Labbé (J. iv. p. 22), Lehr (ibid. p. 120), Weiss, p. 188, and Pilicier, p. 289.²⁴ Their reason is that the wife, in entering into the contract of marriage, acquires a right which cannot be taken from her without her consent, to ²¹ Cf. Trib. Seine, 4th February 1802 (J. ix. p. 544): a French wife may apply to the French Courts for séparation de corps, if the husband, with the view of obtaining divorce, has had himself naturalised abroad, and has obtained a decree of divorce there. See, too, C. de Chambéry, 27th August 1877 (J. v. p. 164). On the other hand, a deserted wife who acquires a new domicile cannot convene her husband in the courts of her new residence. So rightly decided by the English High Court of Justice, 1876, Lesueur v. Lesueur, J. iii. 191 [L.R. 1, P.D. 139].

²² Story, § 229a. Quid juris in the case of a wilful desertion, where the wife does not know where her husband's domicile is? See Richter, Kirchenrecht, § 269 ad fin. [In Scotland see case of Redding, supra, p. 385, note 20.] The decree of divorce must in such a case be recognised even at the new domicile of the husband: the marriage law of a State can bind none but the citizens of that State, and the courts of this country can only pronounce decrees against their own citizens. If, therefore, only one of the persons in question belongs to the State, while the other is, by the law of her domicile, freed from the matrimonial tie, the view which would refuse to regard the subject of the one State as a single person would, by consequence, require a foreigner to submit to its rule, since marriage consists in a union between two persons. If both spouses change their domiciles, the court of the former domicile ceases to be competent. Story, as cited.

²³ See Fœlix, i. pp. 362, 363.

be protected against any divorce save in conformity with the law to which she submitted herself when she was married. I cannot follow this reasoning. If sound, it would establish that a new statute, introducing divorce for the first time, could not be applied to existing marriages except with the consent of both parties. In the one case, as in the other, it may be said that the spouses were wedded on the faith of the laws which then ruled marriages exclusively. But there is no such thing as a contract right not to be divorced, just as there is no contract right to be divorced. The State, into which the one spouse has been received, will simply, as a matter of logical necessity, apply to this spouse the new personal law under which he has fallen, and dissolve the marriage in accordance with its own law, instead of maintaining a matrimonial relation which has in its view become untenable. Whether the State in which the other spouse has remained is in this event also to regard the marriage as dissolved, depends on whether it looks upon marriage as necessarily a bilateral relation, or, in conformity with the conception of the Catholic Church, treats it as a sacrament which unconditionally binds the individual.

We may further refer to Nobelet's paper (J. xiv. p. 575): "De la conversion en divorce d'une séparation de corps à l'étranger entre étrangers," and that of Humblet on the same subject (J. xv. p. 461), for a discussion of the question as to what is to be the result where the spouses have different nationalities, or where they change their nationality.

We are prepared to go thus far with the results of the former paper, that it is only a person who has become naturalised in a country who can transform a séparation de corps into a true divorce under the rules of his or her new personal law, and that a mere change of domicile at least cannot have that effect, if we follow French or Belgian law. But putting aside altogether the consideration that we can by no means admit that processes of naturalisation, which are alleged to have been gone through in fraudem legis, are to have no validity, we do not believe that the wife, who has remained in what used to be her husband's country, can stop the divorce of that husband, who is now domiciled in Belgium, simply by leaving the citation in the process unanswered, or disputing the competency of the court. The question at issue is a question of the status of a naturalised Belgian, and the courts of Belgium must be competent. Certainly this objection to competency cannot be raised under any of the numbers 1-10 of the 52nd article of the Belgian statute of 25th March 1876, which deal with the competency of Belgian courts in questions with foreigners. But the primary question in such a case is not so much the foundation of the action against a foreign wife who has remained in her own country, as of the release of a naturalised Belgian from the matrimonial bond. The question whether the wife who has remained abroad is still bound by the marriage can only be regarded as a question dependent upon that as to the status of the husband, at least in any Belgian court which is invited to determine that status. In our view, the wife who remains abroad has herself the right of transforming the separation into divorce in the courts of her own country, and according to the rules of its law, and to cite the naturalised Belgian to appear there. From the point of view of international law, this citation seems simply to be an opportunity afforded to the defender of informing him or herself of the proceedings. Although the party cited makes no use of this opportunity, the question will, all the same, be brought to a decision, and the status of the subject of the country determined. Humblet's paper is too much based upon the details of the French and Belgian legislation, to merit a thorough examination here.

NATURALISATION IN ANOTHER STATE WITH THE OBJECT OF BEING DIVORCED.

§ 175. What are we, however, to say to the case of two spouses, who, for the very purpose of evading the law of the country to which they belong, which either forbids divorce altogether, or makes it impossible for them in the particular circumstances of the case, get themselves naturalised in another country, obtain a divorce there, and at once return into their former country? Is a divorce so obtained, openly in fraudem legis, a nullity?

The law of England and the United States says it is null,²⁵ and so does that of France.

If, as is the case in the law of England and in the United States, we take domicile and not nationality as our basis, there is no doubt of the correctness of this solution. If a man merely makes a show of changing his domicile, he has in truth not changed it at all (see supra, § 68): the court of this pretended new domicile had therefore no jurisdiction, and with its jurisdiction stands or falls all claim that the decree of divorce could make to international recognition. But, in so far as French law is concerned, the matter stands otherwise. It regards naturalisation no doubt as a formal act, but has not yet been able to shake itself entirely free from the old domicile theory; but if we consider the logical consequences of holding naturalisation to be a public formality, into which no reservations mentales can, or indeed in the public interest will be allowed to enter, the divorce must be pronounced to be valid. We can refuse the spouses the power of regaining their former nationality, and, if their residence in the country, by reason of their open contempt of its law, creates a scandal, we can expel them. This is a sounder method than the refusal to recognise the decree of divorce pronounced abroad, because such a refusal will often lead to a contradictory treatment of the family relations of the same persons in different countries, which may be highly prejudicial even to third persons. If the legislation in question (e.g. the French) makes it very easy to reacquire the lost French nationality, there is, then, every inducement to uphold the theory of the invalidity of the naturalisation, because of its having taken place in fraudem legis.

Again, a law which permits its citizens to have a sentence of separation a mensa et thoro, which has been pronounced at some earlier period, transformed into a true divorce, has reference to subjects who have become its subjects subsequently to the decree of separation. From this springs the controversy, which for a time was much debated, as to the so-called Transylvanian or Klausenburg marriages in Austria.²⁶ The Austrian, i.e. Cisleithanian law, in cases in which one of the spouses is Catholic, allows only separation a mensa et thoro; the law of Transylvania, on the other hand, being a Protestant law, recognises complete divorce. Spouses who have been separated in Austria, one of them being Protestant, had themselves naturalised in Hungary and divorced in Transylvania, in order that they might contract a new marriage there. The validity of such a divorce, and the validity, therefore, of the second marriage, cannot be reasonably questioned, if both spouses were naturalised in another country, in Hungary in the case on hand. (If we take domicile as the principle which is to regulate the marriage law, of course domicile must be substituted for naturalisation.) This is the overwhelmingly preponderant view in Austrian jurisprudence. In the opinion of Lyon-Caen, the result will be different if only one of the spouses changes his or her nationality, because one spouse cannot at his or her pleasure turn what was an indissoluble marriage into one that can be dissolved. But this is not a proper way in which to put the difficulty, because the question of the dissolubility of the marriage depends upon the nationality; the nationality cannot be made dependent upon the character of the marriage. It is much more correct to say that the question is precisely the one which was raised, and discussed by us already (§ 66) in the Bauffremont case. And, as in Austria it is law that a husband by naturalisation in another State at once naturalises his wife in the same State, in Austrian law the only case which can raise a difficulty is the case of a wife being naturalised in a foreign country. If, in such a case, we start from a strictly Catholic point of view,²⁷ we reach the result that the husband who has remained in Cisleithanian Austria will not be able to marry again. But if, on the other hand, we start from the natural idea, dictated by no ascetic rules of religious belief, that marriage is a bilateral relation,²⁸ and that, therefore, it ceases to be binding on the one side when it has ceased to be binding upon the other, the result is that by the divorce pronounced in a foreign country, if the spouse obtaining it has validly made himself or herself a foreigner, the other party at once acquires the capacity of being married again.

COMPETENCY IN ACTIONS OF NULLITY.

§ 175a. The same principles which regulate the competency of the courts in matters of divorce, are to be applied to suits directed to declaring marriages null, with this exception only, that, if the wife has not yet in fact followed her husband to his domicile, the action can be raised with effect in her domicile. For under these circumstances the action for nullity implies the contention that the wife has retained her former domicile.²⁹

SECOND MARRIAGES.

§ 176. Lastly, it is debated what law is to decide as to the possibility of the divorced spouse contracting a second marriage.³⁰ Several French authors, proceeding on the assumption that the question is one as to personal capacity, have laid it down that the law of the place where the divorce was obtained cannot be pleaded, and have referred exclusively to the law recognised at the subsequent domicile of the party. We have already remarked that almost all rules of law are capable of being expressed in the form of a deliverance upon the capacity or incapacity of a person, and therefore we cannot, from the mere use of the terms capacity or incapacity, infer that the lex domicilii should be applied, except where we find the definite conception of incapacity to act and to enjoy rights.³¹

²⁸ For this view and the deduction that is drawn from it in the text, see Folleville, De la naturalisation, p. 481, and Demolombe, Droit Civ. i. § 101.

But, as a matter of fact, to refuse to recognise the capacity of one who had obtained a decree of divorce in a competent foreign court to marry again, would be to deny the validity of that divorce. We may therefore lay down that there is capacity for a new marriage if that is allowed by the law which rules in the court that has competently pronounced decree of divorce,³² and that even in countries which recognise no divorce. And it is also true that the subjects of a country in which divorce is not recognised may, on a sound view of the law,³³ contract a valid marriage with a person who has been divorced by a competent foreign tribunal.³⁴

At the same time, it is only for its own citizens that the law of any country lays down bars to marriage, and not for persons who were citizens but have passed into the citizenship of another State. We must, therefore, recognise the capacity for a second marriage, if that is the law of any new domicile that may be acquired, although it may not be the law of the place of divorce; such a case would occur where by the law of the place of divorce the guilty party was forbidden to marry again till the other party died, while the subsequently acquired personal law made no such prohibition. The practice of the United States is to hold a marriage valid if the spouses were capable of a valid marriage by the law of the place where the new marriage was celebrated.³⁵ But it would seem indispensable that these persons should have acquired a bona fide domicile at this latter place.³⁶

³⁴ It is entirely unsound to determine the capacity of a foreign woman, who has been divorced, to marry a native subject, according to the law of the place in which the marriage was celebrated, a course recently taken by the Supreme Court of Austria, 30th November 1880 (Jour. xiii. p. 471), under reference to § 36 of the Austrian statute book. Such a decision could only be justified by adopting the theory of the United States, which is repudiated alike by the legislation and the practice of Austria. § 36 of the statute book speaks merely of the substantive provisions of contracts, not of capacity to contract. The latter is dealt with by § 34, and according to it the personal law of the foreigner rules.

³⁵ Story, § 89; Wharton, § 135, and especially Seymour van Santvoord (Jour. viii. pp. 138-145).

³⁶ Seymour refuses to allow this limitation if the law does not expressly provide for the nullity of the marriage otherwise. As to the position of clergymen and officials whose attendance is desired at a marriage of which their law disapproves, see supra, § 159.

LAW OF DIVORCE IF THE COURT OF THE DOMICILE IS DECLARED
COMPETENT. IS IT DESIRABLE TO DECLARE IT TO BE COMPETENT?

§ 177. We have laid down the principle that none but the courts of the country to which the spouses by nationality belong are competent in cases of divorce.³⁷ But some legal systems take a different view, and make the forum domicilii also competent.³⁸ In that case it must be taken to be certain that the State, to which the spouses by nationality belong, will at the most only recognise a divorce pronounced by the courts of another State,³⁹ if the grounds on which it is pronounced are good by its own law also. It must, of course, like the law of England and of the United States, and like the general practice of the common law of Germany, allow the law of the domicile to govern the process not merely as regards form, but as regards its merits. It can then only be determined by a careful revision of the decree, and of the process by means of which this decree has been reached, whether the personal law which is to govern has been transgressed, if not in the letter, yet perhaps in the spirit.⁴⁰ Such a revision, however, simply implies non-recognition of the judgment already pronounced as res judicata. In truth, the revising court in such a case pronounces a new decree, in which it may no doubt use the materials collected in the former process, in so far as that is allowed by the rules that guide the process, e.g. the principles by which oral procedure is governed. That shows how mistaken⁴¹ the whole theory is. The parties have obtained a decree of divorce, and know not whether their own State,

The former judgment of the Imperial Court, sound de lege lata, has, in obedience to § 77 of the German statute for the regulation of personal status, destroyed the validity of what was in truth a correct proposition of the 3rd section of a law of Saxony of date 4th March 1879, which ran thus, viz.: "The invalidity and the dissolution of a marriage, if the husband is not nationalised either in Saxony or in any other State of the German federation, can only be declared, provided that the judgment is recognised as effectual by the law of the State to which the husband belongs."

³⁹ Cf. Weiss, p. 709. The resolution (vi.) of the Institute in 1887 (Ann. ix. p. 129) is, peculiarly enough, to a different effect.

⁴⁰ Even if, on the merits, exactly the same result would have been reached by both laws in the particular case. It might, possibly, be matter for consideration that the process proceeds quickly in the one country, but slowly in the other, in order that the spouses may have an opportunity for reconciliation. See the instructive conclusions of the public ministry in the interesting case reported in Jour. xii. p. 548. The judgment of the Trib. Seine of 4th June 1885 avoided this disputed point, and on another ground pronounced against the recognition of the foreign decree of divorce, which had not been obtained in fraudem legis.

where they have their home, and in which that decree will principally operate, will recognise the same. For this reason, up to the present time, the 56th article of the Swiss Federal law as to civil status, of 24th December 1874, which makes the question of the competency of the tribunals of Switzerland, for suits for divorce and for nullity of marriage, dependent on the question whether the decree of the Swiss court will be recognised by the State to which the spouses belong, has had a limited and uncertain operation.⁴²

§ 178. It cannot, however, be denied that to refer the spouses to the courts of the State to which by nationality they belong, if this happens to lie at a great distance, creates under certain circumstances serious and prejudicial difficulties in obtaining justice. That is the reason why in modern times, in the French and Franco-Swiss schools of jurisprudence, we find an increase in the number of those who think that the forum domicilii should be sanctioned as well as the forum originis, i.e. the forum of the State to which the parties by nationality belong. Amongst these are Demangeat (on Foelix, i. § 158, p. 332, note), Gentet, p. 95, Gerbaut, § 392, and Pilicier.⁴³ The last named, who (pp. 20 and 242) discusses the question very thoroughly, insists, like Gentet and Gerbaut, most energetically on the exclusive application of the national law of the spouses in matters that concern the dissolution of the marriage, which he regards as questions of status. But he is of opinion that the court in such matters need not exclusively apply the lex fori, and again, since the State must do justice to foreigners as well as to its own citizens, and the natural judge between the parties is the judex domicilii, the courts of the domicile⁴⁴ are competent to determine

⁴⁴ The view, which requires (in French law) a domicile authorised by the State to make the courts competent in such matters, stands or falls with the proposition that no foreigner, unless he have such a domicile, is entitled to invoke the protection of the courts. It has found some favour in Franco-Belgian jurisprudence (Civil tribunal of Lüttich, 21st March 1886, Jour. xiv. p. 215), but it does not present the advantage of facilitating the prosecution of such suits, since it is inapplicable to the numberless cases in which there has been a domicile, but one not authorised by the State, for years. Very recently the right of the courts of a foreign domicile to divorce French spouses has been recognised by a judgment of the Civil Tribunal of the Seine, declaring the sentence of the foreign court enforceable in France (2nd August 1887, Jour. xv. p. 86). We may look forward with interest to a judgment on the subject by the higher courts when the case arises again.

matrimonial questions between foreigners. The difficulty is solved by holding that the judex domicilii shall take the loi nationale of the parties to guide him, and thus the State to which they belong will have no excuse for refusing to recognise the sentence of the judex domicilii.

It would, he argues, be an evil which should by all means be avoided in matrimonial matters, and suits affecting status, if such a judgment was not to be recognised, as it might not be if the judex domicilii applied his own rules of law exclusively.⁴⁵ Two reasons, however, must be stated against this theory, which, no doubt, is entitled to serious consideration. In the first place, it will be difficult to convince the court that the law of divorce is not pre-eminently a part of the jus publicum. The legislature, which refuses to recognise divorce altogether, or will only do so under certain fixed conditions, will look in the one case on all divorces, in the other on divorces under more easy conditions, as a procedure which on moral grounds cannot be approved. A decree of divorce may indeed be recognised, if it has been procured before a competent foreign court, but it can never be right to set the courts of this country in motion to work it out, unless violence is to be done to our own views of the social relations involved in marriage. Conversely the State, which in this or that case allows divorce, would run counter to its own theories, if, on the ground of some foreign law, it refused the spouses the liberty they desire. General usage, too, is on this point against Pilicier, with the exception, perhaps, of some judgments of the Swiss courts, which are under the influence of the exceptional Swiss statute of 1874. One restriction which Pilicier himself (p. 269) makes, really destroys his principle, viz. that the judge of the domicile shall refuse to exercise his jurisdiction, if the interests of social order and public morality seem to make it his duty to decline. In the practice of most States, the jurisdiction of the courts of the country to which the parties belong, which Pilicier admits as concurrent with the other, is found to be the only one which in fact can be recognised.⁴⁶ The German Imperial Court holds it to be inadmissible, since German law recognises only divorce, and knows nothing now of a permanent separation from bed and board, to pronounce a sentence to this latter effect even in the case of foreign spouses;⁴⁷ and I am not aware, to take the converse case, that a court, by the law of which divorce is incompetent, ever divorced a foreign couple. But, in the second place, there seems to be no likelihood that the country to which the parties belong will recognise the judgment of a foreign court as a true res judicata, i.e. will refrain from examining it on its merits, even although the foreign court may have intended to apply nothing but the domestic law of the spouses.⁴⁸ It is a familiar fact, that in applying foreign rules of law mistakes are easily made, and it is not so easy to avoid these in the domain of matrimonial law, as in that of the law of obligations, since in matrimonial suits both parties have frequently the same interest in the long run, and will try to lead the judge astray. In the law of marriage, too, we find that practice has more to say than precise enactment. As an instance, we may recall the fact that the grounds of divorce recognised by the Protestant Church have in different German States undergone a very different development. It is not, therefore, pure logic alone which in this department of law prescribes to the different courts what their decision should be. The leading error in all Pilicier's treatment⁴⁹ (see especially p. 5) consists in this, that he makes an absolute separation between questions of the applicability of foreign law, on the one hand, and the jurisdiction of foreign courts on the other, and allows the latter to rule the former. Whereas, as a matter of principle, the applicability of different legal systems is the primary question for determination, while questions as to the jurisdiction of the courts are only secondary. They stand, however, in intimate mutual relations to each other. A judgment of the Swiss Federal Court, of 4th August 1879, cited by Pilicier himself, for the purpose of being subjected to criticism, gives a very sound exposition of this view.

⁴⁷ On the doubts in modern French jurisprudence, see Jour. xii. p. 154; see, too, Ct. of Brussels, 30th May 1885, Jour. xiv. p. 214.

Moreover, the propositions adopted by the Institute of International Law during their meeting at Heidelberg in 1887, with reference to this subject, propositions which in part reproduce the scheme of König, are entirely illogical. After providing, in the first sentence of the seventh resolution on the law of marriage, to which we have frequently referred, by a perfectly sound deduction from the Oxford resolutions on the loi nationale in questions of status, that—

“La question de savoir si un divorce est légalement admissible ou non dépend de la législation nationale des époux ;”

⁴⁸ See, too, Asser, p. 118. Pilicier's attack upon Asser (p. 22) is not successful. Asser by no means maintains that the judge whose law recognises only divorce, and not separation from bed and board, must divorce “tout le monde.” What he does maintain is, that if that judge is actually to consider the question, he can only have divorce in view, and cannot entertain a question of separation. That is sound. The argument used by Laurent, and adopted by Pilicier, to the effect that Asser's theory, which is the same theory as I supported in my first edition, first pronounces divorce to be a statut personnel, and ends by treating it as a statut territorial, is a mere sophistry. Nothing can be deduced from such a terminology, as I have shown already (see §§ 29, 30). The fact is simply this: the law of divorce is no doubt dependent on the personal law, but at the same time unquestionably belongs to “ordre public,” and thus a court may be prevented from bringing foreign law directly into play.

⁴⁹ On the other hand, Pilicier's attack upon French practice, and in particular that of the Court of Cassation, by which the merits of any action of divorce will be tested by French law, if the parties have a domicile authorised by the Government in France, is very well justified. In this matter French practice abounds in illogicalities and contradictions. We cannot give an absolutely clear exposition of the points raised in this connection, until we come to the discussion of the competency of the courts of different nations. See Chavegrin, Jour. xii. p. 154, and Pilicier, pp. 34-91, on the details of French jurisprudence in this connection.

The second paragraph proceeds thus:—

“Mais une fois le divorce admis en principe par la loi nationale, les causes qui la motivent doivent être celles de la loi du lieu où l'action est intentée.”

The court, then, before which an action for divorce is brought, must ask itself this question, viz.: Does the national law of the parties permit divorce under any conditions at all? If this question is answered in the affirmative, then it simply applies the lex fori. That is, of course, a simplification of procedure which will be very pleasant for the court, since the question we have put may, as a rule, be answered without any trouble, whereas very serious difficulties may arise in attempting to say whether some particular fact is, by the domestic law of the spouses, a sufficient ground for divorce. But this must be kept in mind, that it is not divorce in abstracto that is the important matter: the question of much greater importance in practice is, what are admissible grounds for divorce?⁵⁰ Compare for a moment the strict law of divorce which obtains in England with the lax principles of the Prussian Allgemeines Landrecht, which permit divorce by mutual consent, and it will be conceded that it is just when one looks at the particular grounds for divorce that the fundamental differences of social theory are brought out. We cannot possibly proceed, therefore, on the footing that the State to which the parties belong, whose recognition of the divorce is as a matter of fact of most importance, will have no interest in the grounds of the divorce, no interest beyond seeing that there is agreement between the two systems on the abstract question of principle. On the contrary, it is highly improbable that the legal systems of different countries will allow the subsistence of the marriage ties of their subjects to be dependent on the laws of a foreign country; and thus this proposition, which is in juristic illogicality almost without precedent, will operate as an actual impediment against the general adoption of the Heidelberg resolutions.

No doubt the rule will have a less extensive importance, if the competent tribunal, which is spoken of in the third paragraph of No. vii., is to be exclusively or generally that of the State to which the parties belong. Then the last proposition of the Heidelberg resolutions, in itself highly desirable, will be realised, viz. :—

“Le divorce ainsi prononcé par le tribunal compétent sera reconnu partout.”

On the question of competency, the Institute has not as yet given any deliverance, and has not adopted the rule of König's scheme, according to which the competent, and only competent, judge shall be the judge of the domicile.^{51 52}

⁵¹ In König's scheme the 12th article bore; La question de savoir si un divorce est légalement admissible ou non dépend de la législation nationale du mari. Mais une fois le divorce admis:

When the resolutions on the law of marriage, which were adopted at Heidelberg in 1887, were revised at the meeting of the Institute at Lausanne in 1888, the seventeenth and eighteenth paragraphs of the regulations finally adopted were thus expressed, viz:—

“(17.) La question de savoir si un divorce est légalement admissible ou non dépend de la législation des époux.

“(18.) Si le divorce est admis en principe par la loi nationale, les causes qui le motivent doivent être celles de la loi du lieu où l'action est intentée. Le divorce ainsi prononcé par le tribunal compétent sera reconnu valable partout.”

As the question of jurisdiction is entirely reserved, the meaning of these propositions is left completely undefined.

AN INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNAL FOR MATRIMONIAL QUESTIONS?

§ 179. Lastly, we must say that a proposal of Lehr (J. xi. p. 49), in favour of which Weiss has pronounced (p. 717), is not satisfactory. He proposes to set up a general international court to decide matrimonial suits in which questions of private international law are involved. In the form in which it is put forward, this suggestion seems somewhat vague. This much, however, is certain, that an international tribunal of the kind would mean, owing to the enormous distances at which parties might be from the seat of the court, a complete denial of justice. Again, the decisions of all courts on questions of private international law must in practice rest primarily on the legal principles of their own country, but, since in every case that came before this international court there would probably be a majority of judges belonging to countries different from that to which the case belonged, there would be imminent danger that the law of that country would not be respected. We could hardly, therefore, expect the en principe par la loi nationale, les causes qui le motivent doivent être celles de la législation du domicile du mari; le juge compétent sera celui du domicile.” The theory thus put forward by König may be looked upon as a modification of what was proposed by Barillet (J. vii. p. 361): the Swiss judge (judex domicilii) shall apply no law but his own (lex fori). Pilicier, p. 98, shows very clearly the serious consequences of this view, if the State to which the parties belong does not recognise such divorces, as e.g. would be the case with Italian subjects.

⁸² Very recently König has again modified his opinion (see opinion cited above with reference to the alteration of the law in Switzerland). He refers to the authority of Rossi, and his new proposal is “that in divorce suits by foreigners, whose law allows divorce, the tribunal of the domicile be generally recognised as the proper tribunal, and that divorce may be granted on grounds which are recognised by the law of Switzerland as well as by the law of the country to which the spouses belong.” In this way a probability approaching certainty is attained, that the Swiss decree will be recognised and executed abroad. In one respect, this is no doubt much less serious than the proposal of König which was formerly adopted by the Institute of International Law. But practice may well show that very great difficulties will be involved in keeping two different systems of matrimonial law in view at once. For instance, what is to be said of the res judicata, if the action is thrown out? Does this dismissal of the action take effect de plano in the country to which the spouses belong?

legislative powers of the different States to hold out a helping hand to any such arrangement, and all the less so, as in matrimonial law the differences of opinion are differences as to social and moral problems. The case,⁵³ cited by Lehr as an illustration of his proposal, rests in part simply on an error in the legal system of one of the countries concerned, viz. the error of the law of Hungary in refusing to apply the familiar rule "locus regit actum" to cases where there is a conflict between religious and so-called civil forms of celebration of marriage. Where errors like this exist in legal systems, the necessary result is that the courts will fall into erroneous conclusions. But, again, the official at Zürich who celebrated the marriage fell, as is pointed out in the judgment of the Federal court, into error. He gave no thought to the possibility of the rule "locus regit actum" not being recognised by the law of the country to which the parties belonged. Now, is it intended that this international tribunal, whose very name seems to many to guarantee relief to all the evils known to the law, shall have power to amend and alter laws? We do not mean to say that a decision pronounced in accordance simply with sound reason—a course which Lehr points at for the case on hand—would not, where you find a foreign law that is contrary to all good sense, be preferable in the long run to the decision of the Swiss Federal court, which follows too closely the letter of the statute. But it may seem very doubtful whether the Swiss courts had any power to pronounce so broad a judgment.

We must, however, admit an exception to the rule that none but the courts of the State to which the spouses permanently belong have jurisdiction in such matters, in cases in which it would de facto lead to a real denial of justice to declare that there was no jurisdiction in the courts of the domicile: and in using the term domicile we may perhaps (?) place in the same category a place of residence for a considerable time.⁵⁴ But such a case cannot be held to arise where some definite foreign nationality or citizenship is patent on the face of the facts, or where the defender pleads such foreign nationality as a ground for urging that the court is ⁵³ J. xi. p. 483 (case of Bacs). A Hungarian citizen married in Zürich a Swiss woman according to the forms of the civil marriage, whereas the law of his own country absolutely forbids civil marriage. The Hungarian consul thereupon declared that the marriage would be regarded in Hungary as non-existent. Upon this the court of Zürich rejected an action of divorce raised by the husband, founding on the 56th article of the Swiss statute, and the Federal court refused an appeal. This determination was sound, for a marriage, which by the law of the parties' own country has no existence, cannot be dissolved, and a divorce which has followed on such a union cannot be recognised by the country of either. The simplest course is to treat the marriage in such a case as ipso jure null, and that is the import of the declaration of the Hungarian consul. That is so because the proper ceremony, i.e. the ceremony which will be recognised by the parties' own State, has never been observed. The solution given by Muheim (p. 199) is peculiar, but not very scientific. Divorce, in cases in which the law of the parties' own country pronounces the marriage to be altogether invalid, should proceed according to the law of the country in which the marriage took place. The divorce will then simply dissolve the ceremony or form of marriage, the marriage itself having no real existence. See Kittner (J. xii. p. 152) on the Bacs case.

⁵⁴ See Trib. Marseille, 23rd April 1875 (J. iii. p. 186), and Clunet's remarks there, on the most modern French jurisprudence.

incompetent. The courts of France are inclined, in cases in which the interest of foreign spouses are involved, to declare in favour of their own jurisdiction, if the objection to their jurisdiction is not timeously put forward.⁵⁵ This goes too far. In that way jurisdiction will be founded by a voluntary subjection by the parties themselves, and in matrimonial questions in the stricter sense such a voluntary prorogation of a foreign court and its law is forbidden by the general conceptions of the legal systems of all civilised States.⁵⁶

The jurisdiction of the judex domicilii, however desirable it may be in itself, is, in our view, as a rule only to be recognised under special conditions, whereby the application of the national law of the parties is really secured, conditions which we shall discuss on another occasion. They can only be provided by means of positive enactment.

DECISIONS UPON BARS OR OPPOSITIONS TO MARRIAGE.

§ 180. A special question of jurisdiction may be raised in such cases as those in which the officer charged with the care of matters affecting status refuses to celebrate the wedding, or where some third person raises opposition to the wedding (Cod. Civ. § 172), or where some rectification of a register is desired. The primary question here is as to an act of the public executive, or an order which ought to be given to a public official. The officers and courts of the State, in whose territory and by whose officials the act in question must be done, are alone competent in such matters.⁵⁷ It is, too, the law of this latter State which prescribes what officials and what courts are competent, and they may also prescribe that the courts of this country are competent in the case of foreigners who have a domicile, or even a mere place of residence, in this country. Of course, if the official who is charged with matters of status can only perform the act which he is desired to perform, if, for instance, there shall have been a valid judgment pronounced as to the nullity of a marriage, so that this nullity is not to be regarded as a merely incidental or prejudicial point; then this condition precedent to the official's action belongs to the foreign court, provided always that that foreign court would at any rate be the only court competent to decide in this process of declarator of nullity.

NOTE K ON §§ 173-180. INTERNATIONAL ASPECTS OF DIVORCE.

[As regards the grounds on which a decree of divorce may competently be pronounced, so as to be recognised by the courts of other countries, it has been laid down in the House of Lords (Harvey v. Farnie, Nov. 30, 1882, L.R. 8, App. Ca. p. 43), that the decision of a competent foreign Christian tribunal, dissolving a marriage celebrated in England between an Englishwoman and a domiciled native of the country where the divorce was pronounced, will be recognised, although that decree proceeds upon grounds that may not be known to the law of England as grounds for divorce, e.g. upon desertion as that term is understood in the law of Scotland. This decision disposes of the old notion of the indissolubility of an English marriage, i.e. of the notion that a marriage celebrated in England could only be dissolved by English courts and in conformity with English law. It also seems to determine that the law which the competent court is to apply is to be the lex fori. This, then, may be taken to be the law of both England and Scotland, viz. that the competent court must apply its own law to determine what is or is not a sufficient ground of divorce, and that a determination on this ground will be recognised in England and Scotland.

⁵⁵ Competency of the French courts, where no definite nationality can be asserted (Trib. Civ. Marseille, C. d'Aix, 3rd July 1873, J. ii. p. 273). This is probably sound. C. Dijon, 7th April 1857 (J. xv. p. 87).

⁵⁶ Cf. e.g. B. C. Rouen, 12th May 1874 (J. ii. p. 356), and the special paper on this subject by Féraud-Giraud in J. xii. pp. 379 et seq. præ. 390.

⁵⁷ See Gentet, p. 72.

The important matter for determination in these countries is, therefore, what is the competent court, or, on what considerations is the jurisdiction of a divorce court to be founded? In determining on what principles the courts of any country will sustain their own jurisdiction in divorce or separation, we shall also find an answer to the question what principles the courts of one country, when asked to recognise foreign decrees of divorce, require to be observed in those of the foreign country before they will recognise its sentences. If domicile be required in country A to found jurisdiction, its courts will not recognise a decree pronounced in country B upon an asserted jurisdiction ratione delicti commissi. All courts, too, especially those of America, will take care before recognising a foreign decree to see that it was not obtained without due notice and the observance of the regular forms; cf. Shaw v. Att. Gen. (1870, L. R. 2, P. and M. p. 156), where the husband had no notice of the suit "except an advertisement which he never saw and was never likely to see;" and a case decided by the Appeal Court of New York (People v. Belker, 21st Jan. 1873), where it was held that a decree pronounced in another State against a citizen of New York, who was domiciled in New York, and had been in residence there during the action, could not be recognised.

It will, then, be understood that a court, in exercising its own jurisdiction according to certain rules, implies thereby that it will recognise decrees of foreign courts based upon like jurisdiction.

The only principles of jurisdiction now recognised are nationality, domicile, and what has been called matrimonial domicile, i.e. residence of such a duration and of such a nature by the spouses as married persons within any territory, as to justify either of them holding that their matrimonial relations are to be determined by the law of that territory, and that he or she is therefore entitled to appeal to that law against any infringement of these relations by the other spouse. The jurisdictions formerly claimed in Scotland by virtue of a residence by the defender for forty days, coupled with citation there, and in other cases by virtue of a personal citation in Scotland and the fact of the commission of the adultery there—the forum delicti commissi—have now been distinctly abandoned (Stavert v. Stavert, Feb. 1882, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. ix. p. 519). In this case all the previous authorities on the subject were reviewed, and jurisdiction on these grounds rejected, and it was held that the mere fact of the commission of the adultery in the territory could not give the courts any right to deal with the permanent status of the parties.

Domicile, i.e. a complete domicile, such as would regulate succession, is admitted as founding jurisdiction for divorce not only in America, Scotland, England, and other countries where domicile is the ordinary ground for founding jurisdiction and determining capacity, but is also accepted as sufficient in France, Belgium, Italy, and countries where nationality and not domicile is the ordinary criterion for determining the status, capacity, and personal rights of every individual, and establishing jurisdiction. The American courts in New Jersey have refused to entertain an action instituted by a Canadian woman, who had been married to an American citizen in New Jersey, his domicile being in another State (Blumenthal v. Tannenhole, May 1879, Chancery Court of New Jersey); and have also declined to recognise a divorce obtained in Utah without a domicile or residence being had in that State (Supreme Court of Minnesota, 25th April 1878). A Frenchman who married a Belgian, and afterwards lived for twenty years in Belgium, was held to have acquired a domicile there, and therefore to be entitled to divorce according to the law of Belgium, in spite of the fact of his French nationality at the date of his marriage (Viminet, C. de Bruxelles, 1877, J. v. p. 513.) In this case there was complete bona fides in the residence in Belgium, an important consideration, as we shall see. The domicile in such cases is always the domicile of the husband, which is imputed to the wife. (In England, Rateliff, 1859, 1, S. and T. 467; Wilson, 1872, L. R. 2, P. and M. 435. In Scotland, Warrender v. Warrender, 1835, 2, C. C. and Fin. 488; and 2, S. and M'L. 154; also Low, 1891, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xix. p. 115.) In France the nationality of a wife has in the same way been held to be sunk in that of her husband so as to entitle him to divorce her, being a Frenchwoman, in his own courts abroad (Van Overbecke, Trib. Civ. de la Seine, 1880, J. vii. p. 303). A suit in Austria at the domicile of the husband was held competent, although the wife, who brought the action, was living at the date of the action, and had lived for the greater part of the married life, with her husband in Italy (Supreme Court of Austria, 1872, J. v. p. 386).

There is also accepted, as a ground for founding jurisdiction in cases of divorce, a domicile of somewhat less completeness than is required for the purposes of succession. In Scotland it has been the opinion of eminent judges that "there may be a residence or domicile founding jurisdiction such as would not regulate succession, as where a husband and wife have been for years resident in Scotland as married parties, but where the husband, from being a foreigner, and only in Scotland on the public service, may never have acquired a domicile of succession in this country" (per Lords Neaves and Mackenzie, in Jack v. Jack, 7th Feb. 1862, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd series, 467). "The impossibility of resting jurisdiction in divorce exclusively on the domicile of succession, is obvious from other considerations equally cogent and conclusive" (per Inglis L. J.-C. in same case). This has since been recognised in Scotland as sound law, but Lord Westbury, in the House of Lords, in giving judgment in a Scotch appeal (Pitt v. Pitt, 4 Macq. 627), indicated a distinct opinion that this "matrimonial domicile," as it has been called, is not a good ground on which to rest jurisdiction. It was not, however, necessary for the decision of the case that this view should have been expressed; it has not been put in force in any Scots judgment, nor is it consistent with the law of England as stated by the highest authorities (see infra). Inglis, L. P., thus states the present state of the law in the case of Stavert v. Stavert (cited supra): "Now, a very important question arises in some such cases, whether the domicile necessary to found jurisdiction is the same as that which would regulate the intestate succession of the husband, or whether it is not sufficient that Scotland has been the settled home of the marriage for some period with no intention of leaving the country, where the spouses have settled down to live, where the household gods have been set up for the time, and which, if a separation, judicial or otherwise, has been arranged, would be the place where one party owes the duty of returning for the restitution of the conjugal relations. . . . It has not yet been decided in the court of last resort" (i.e. the House of Lords) "whether it is so, and I merely notice the matter in passing. If the answer depended on the decisions pronounced by this court, it is pretty clear what it would be." His lordship indicates that the theory formerly adopted in Scotland of the sufficiency of such a domicile would still be applied by Scots courts, but his brethren, Lord Deas and Shand, in the same case, held that a complete domicile would be necessary. In the subsequent case of Low in 1891 (see supra), the doctrine of matrimonial domicile is rejected.

In England there seems to have been the same question, and the same hesitation as to the sufficiency of any domicile short of a complete domicile; but the law, as it stands at present, is thus stated by Mr Westlake (p. 75): "When the husband, being either petitioner or respondent, though not domiciled in England, is resident there, not on a visit or as a traveller, and not having taken up that residence for the purpose of obtaining or facilitating a divorce, the court has authority to grant a divorce wherever the adultery was committed, or, if the husband be respondent, wherever the adultery and cruelty or desertion were committed" Cf. Niboyet, 1878, L.R. 4, P.D. 1, the tendency of which decision is to make residence and not domicile the ground for jurisdiction. In Detchegoyen's case (1888, L.R. 13, P. and D. 132), Sir James Hannen says: "Apart from the events which have since happened, I should strongly incline to think that, where a man leaves his wife, returning to her from time to time, that is the place of the matrimonial home." In that particular case, England was found to be the true domicile of the husband, and therefore of both spouses, but a "matrimonial home," which would give the court jurisdiction, appears to be recognised as something distinct from domicile.

The necessity of recognising in such matters some special ground of jurisdiction, less stringent than the personal law of the husband, be that the law of his domicile or the law of his nationality, has been indicated by the following decisions of Continental courts:—Such a domicile can be acquired without the loss of a foreign nationality (Cour de Cassation, 11th July 1855); it was held to be acquired by a foreigner who had married a Frenchwoman, and who had lived in France for several years and carried on a trade there (Klötz v. Klötz, Trib. Civ. de Marseilles, 1875, J. iii. p. 185); domiciled foreigners will, in the discretion of the court, be allowed to sue in French courts for séparation de corps, the French law not sanctioning divorce, if neither party objects to the jurisdiction, if public order and morals are not offended, and if the French court is forum conveniens (Mazy v. Jolly, 1878, C. de Nancy, J. v. p. 371); in Switzerland, domicile will confer such jurisdiction without naturalisation (App. Court of Geneva, 1876, J. iii. p. 227), and by a diplomatic convention of 1869, French and Swiss courts have conceded to each other mutual jurisdiction of this character. This has been observed in the Swiss decision just cited, and by the Court of Cassation in France (Benweguen, 1878, J. v. p. 450). This doctrine of "matrimonial domicile" has also been applied by the French courts to this effect, that a woman who has lived with her husband for a considerable period in France, or who has been married in France, with a French marriage contract, is entitled to appeal to the French courts for a separation, although the husband has gone abroad; the object of his departure being to withdraw himself from French jurisdiction and to embarrass his wife in the pursuit of her remedies (Ramondenc, C. de Cass. 1875, J. iii. p. 183; X. Cour. de Chambéry, 1877, J. v. p. 164; Mullier, 1886, J. xiii. p. 349); and even where a man has been naturalised in a foreign country, if this has been done with the object of obtaining a divorce under a foreign law, which may operate prejudicially to the law of the home of the marriage to which the wife is entitled to look for protection, he will not be heard to plead that the French courts, to which his wife has had recourse, have no jurisdiction, Agoust, 1882 (J. ix. p. 544).

The laws of England, Scotland, and America will also sanction the establishment of such a separate domicile by the wife, in order to prevent the husband from taking advantage of his own wrong (Fraser, p. 1289; 4 Phill. 349; Wharton, § 225; Elder v. Reel, American Reports, 414). That separate domicile, it would appear, however, must be in a country in which the marriage has subsisted and the parties have lived as man and wife. A deserted wife cannot, by returning to her forum originis and acquiring a domicile there, the marriage never having subsisted in that country, thereby raise up a right in herself to convene her husband before the courts of that country, in a process of divorce (Redding, 1888, Ct. of Sess. Repts. 4th ser. xv. p. 1102).

The law of Italy recognises the competency of its courts to dispose of questions of divorce raised by persons who have a home or settlement in Italy, which does not amount to a true domicile (Trib. Ancona, 1882, J. xi. p. 553).

This temporary residence or matrimonial domicile (or, it may be, naturalisation in countries where nationality is a ground of jurisdiction) must, however, be genuine, and not acquired collusively (Westlake, ut supra); but, if a true domicile is acquired, it matters not, in Scotland at least, that one of the causes which induced the acquisition of it was a desire to take advantage of the divorce law of the country in which it is acquired (Carswell, 1881, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. viii. p. 901). To prevent collusion, and to protect public morals, the Minister of Justice in France will intervene (Raunheim, 1875, Trib. Civ. de la Seine, J. iii. p. 363); where a French couple fraudulently acquired Swiss nationality in order to obtain divorce, neither of them having ever left Paris, a second marriage contracted by one of the spouses was reduced by the other on the ground of the divorce having been obtained in fraudem legis; his or her own participation in the fraud is no bar, or even if it were, the Minister of Justice has a title to pursue (Vidal, C. de Paris, 1877, J. v. p. 268). Another case of the same kind is reported, where a Frenchman, already separated from his wife, obtained Swiss nationality in December 1874, and was divorced in the Swiss courts in January 1875; he married again in February 1875; he had never left Paris, and it was shown that his foreign nationality had been obtained solely in order to further his second marriage; this was annulled at the instance of the French Minister of Justice (Gravelle Des Vallées, 1878, Trib. Civ. de la Seine, J. v. p. 602). The Belgian courts have decided to the same effect, in the case of a Frenchman who had married a Prussian, and acquired Belgian nationality for the purpose of obtaining a divorce (C. de Bruxelles, 1877, J. v. p. 513); and in the case of the Princess Bauffremont, the French and Belgian courts concurred in holding that a woman who had been married to a Frenchman, and separated from him in France by decree of the French court, could not, by acquiring a foreign nationality in a country where divorce was sanctioned, thereby convert her status into that of a divorced woman, so as to enable her to marry another; it was held as proved that her intention in adopting the new nationality was to enable herself to marry again. In Austria it has been held, without any allegation of fraud, that the marriage of a woman, herself a Catholic, and married in Austria to a Catholic, is indissoluble, and that she cannot, by residing in another country and embracing Protestantism, escape a decree of nullity of the marriage contracted by her abroad, if she should again return to the jurisdiction of the Austrian Courts (Supreme Court of Austria, 1871, J. iv. p. 77).

Again, in 1885, the same court held that without a change of nationality an Austrian subject could not validly have his marriage dissolved by a foreign court (J. xiii. p. 471). In this case the husband had renounced the Catholic faith, while the wife had not, and a second ground of judgment which suggested itself to the court was that, so long as one of the spouses remained true to the Catholic faith, her marriage must be indissoluble; if the marriage was indissoluble as regarded one spouse, it must be so as regarded the other. These judgments, in treating Austrian marriages, celebrated according to the rites of the Roman Catholic Church, as indissoluble, seem to be tainted with the same error as at one time prevailed in England, viz. that an English marriage was not liable to be dissolved under any circumstances whatever. Where the spouses are, both or either of them, Protestants, the Supreme Court of Austria recognises a divorce pronounced by the court of their domicile (J. xii. pp. 157, 158). French law, although it knows nothing of divorce, accepts liberally foreign judgments, where there is jurisdiction. Thus the courts of France will still recognise the effect of a divorce pronounced in a foreign court having jurisdiction, where one of the parties is French, and will allow the spouse returning to France to marry again, just as if he or she were single. This holds in cases in which the marriage was celebrated in France; and although, from the fact that jurisdiction for divorce is generally founded on domicile, the cases that have occurred have all been cases where the husband, whose domicile is the domicile of the marriage, was a foreigner, and the wife French, the principle would equally apply where a Frenchman by nationality had obtained divorce abroad after a bona fide residence of some duration (Brune de Mans v. Guillamnin, Trib. Civ. de Nogent-le-Rotrou, 1878, J. vi. p. 277; Plaquet v. Maire de Lille, Cour d'Amiens, 1880, J. vii. p. 298; two French persons divorced in Belgium, Lufert v. Roquet, 1887, J. xv. p. 86, see p. 279; and Plaquet, Cour de Cassation, 1878, J. v. p. 499. The last case was several times before the French courts, but was finally determined in a sense favourable to the recognition of the foreign decree). The Cour de Paris (1872, J. i. p. 31) decided that a foreign divorce was good in France, but, by an anomalous restriction of that recognition, required a delay of six months before the parties could validly marry again. In 1887 the Tribunal of the Seine went so far as to recognise the decree of a Belgian court divorcing two French people (J. xv. p. 86). But the soundness of this decision seems to be questioned by French lawyers (J. xv. p. 279).]

G. RELATIONS OF THE SPOUSES AS REGARDS PROPERTY.

THE PRINCIPLE. THE PERSONAL LAW, GENERALLY SPEAKING, THE RULE.

§ 181. Private international law contains under this head a long list of important and difficult questions.

Let us assume, in the first place, for simplicity's sake, that the spouses before marriage belong to the same nation, that there is no difference in their domiciles to call more than one law into play, and still further, that their domicile and the place of the celebration of the marriage are identical. Now, the oldest of all debated questions, which has been discussed since the days of the Postglossatores, at once arises: Does the law of property, applicable to the case of married persons according to the legal system of the domicile of the spouses, extend to real property which lies beyond that territory, or is the lex rei sitæ the exclusive rule?¹ Jurisprudence has been much occupied with this question in particular, viz. whether a community of goods established by the law of the domicile of the spouses attaches to real estate which is situated in another country. Moveable property has always been treated under the rule "mobilia personam sequuntur," and thus moveables situated in another country have been subjected to the personal law of the spouses.

In the Middle Ages the application of the *lex rei sitæ*² was always defended on the ground that the laws which are concerned with the property of married persons speak of things only, and not of persons. We need not spend much time on this illusory and purely scholastic reasoning, any more than on the argument that the authority of the lawgiver is confined to his own territory.³ Lastly, we cannot appeal to the argument that it is contrary to the principles of sovereignty that foreign statutes should have any effect upon real property in another country.⁴ If this were so, all questions of capacity to act, or of obligations, would have to be settled by the law of the place where the subject was situated, if that subject happened to be a right to real property. This much, and this much only, is true, that if, in accordance with the lex rei sitæ, some definite real right to such a subject cannot be constituted at all, or must be constituted in a particular form, then obviously the law of the domicile of the spouses will also pronounce that no such right can exist, or can only exist if the particular form prescribed shall be observed, as the case may be.⁵ But this does not affect the question before us.

The recognition of the lex rei sitæ is even at the present day the only rule known to the practice of England and the United States,⁶ and is generally adopted, too, in that of France.⁷ In England, however, there is an inclination towards the view that the lex domicilii is universal: the theory of English writers certainly leans in this direction, and to some extent also the practice of English courts.⁸

The opposite theory, which had even in more ancient literature a considerable number of representatives, regards exclusively the personal law of the spouses. At the present day it may be said to hold absolute

⁶ See Wharton, § 191.

⁷ See citations by Weiss, p. 692, note 2. It is the old statute theory which is followed here.

⁸ Cf. Westlake Holtzendorff, § 31, and Lord Meadowbank's dictum there quoted. ["The legal assignment of marriage operates without regard to territory." Royal Bank of Scotland v. Ass. of Stein, Smith & Co., Jan. 20, 1813, F.C.] Phillimore, iv. § 340.

sway in Germany,^{9 10} and the new Italian school of course adopts this view. It takes different ground, however, on which to place it, and deduces different results from it. Some writers regard the law of married persons' property as the direct outcome of national customs and arrangements. In that view, of course, the rule must be given not by the domicile, but exclusively by the law of the nationality to which the husband belongs, for it is this law which prescribes generally the organisation of the family.¹¹ Others, again, treat the law of married persons' property as a product of the free will of the spouses. We must infer this will from the circumstances, and it must besides have an universal and an extra-territorial operation. The result of this theory is to leave us hesitating to some extent between the national law of the husband,¹² the law of his domicile at the moment when the question arises,¹³ the law of a domicile which the husband means to acquire so soon as the marriage takes place,¹⁴ and possibly even the law of the place where the marriage is celebrated, especially in cases in which the spouses have lived a considerable time before the celebration of the marriage in this latter place.^{15 16} This last Stobbe, § 34, No. v.

¹⁰ It will, of course, be understood that at the present moment the domicile theory is the prevailing theory in the subject of married persons' property. But to determine such questions by the law of the domicile, lands us at once in difficulties. Is the domicile of the husband at the time the marriage was entered into to decide, or is it to be the domicile which he intends to take up immediately after the marriage? A decision of the Reichsoberhandelsgericht, of 26th March 1876, takes an alternative position on this question. Brocher, too, Nouv. Traité, § 225, calls attention to the doubts to which the principle of domicile gives rise. There are many cases in which the spouses themselves could give no definite answer to the question, where they propose to fix their domicile.

¹¹ So Fiore, § 325; Lomonaco, p. 96; v. Martens, § 73, p. 313; so, too, Féraud-Giraud (J. xii. p. 386). In Austria-Hungary, Vesque v. Püttlingen, p. 238; Revised Statute Book for the Canton of Zürich, § 3, and in addition Schneider Comm. In Zürich there is a very proper recognition of the connection between the law of married persons' property and the law of succession as a factor in this question.

¹² E.g. Laurent, v. § 66; Weiss, p. 693; Durand, p. 338; C. de Bourdeaux, 2nd June 1875 (J. iii. p. 182, and Clunet, J. iv. p. 237); also C. de Paris, 5th February 1887 (J. xiv. p. 190).

¹³ So e.g. C. of Aix, 12th March 1878, J. v. p. 610.

¹⁵ French jurisprudence generally holds, in cases in which a foreigner marries a French woman in France, that the French law as to the property of married persons may be presumed to be that which parties have chosen. Cf. Trib. Marseilles, 12th February 1885 (J. xii. p. 558) and Clunet's note.

view is in truth the same as the old theory, by which, failing a marriage contract, the fiction of an implied contract between the parties was set up.¹⁷

IMPLIED CONTRACT.

§ 182. Argentræus¹⁸ long ago rightly declared against the assumption of any implied contract.¹⁹ At the bottom of the assumption of a tacit contract we find the mistake which we have already noticed, by which the rules of law that adjust these relations are held to be merely expressions of what may be presumed to be the will of the parties.²⁰ If there were a tacit contract as to the property of the spouses implied in every marriage, persons who undoubtedly have the capacity of contracting marriage, but not of binding themselves by any special contracts as to their property, could never come under these statutory provisions; and against this tacit understanding, as against every other understanding which expresses itself in acts, there would be rights of reduction and restitution. But neither of these results is recognised. But again, as a matter of history, it is a mistake to base the origin of the law on any theory of absolute freedom of contract. As a matter of history, the origin of the law is much more in a theory of absolute subjection to some particular national law. The law of most civilised nations in modern times goes a long way, no doubt, in allowing parties to withdraw themselves from the operation of this law and to substitute some other rule for it. This is specially the case with the law of France, which, as a rule, is inclined to look upon the Code Civil as the fundamental and natural law of all civilised nations. The possibility of the parties substituting a law of their own seems obvious to French law. But still the foundation of the law of the family and of succession is always to be found in the positive law of the land; it is upon that law that the exercise of the power of the parties to substitute another really proceeds. What is to be the result, if the national law, let us say of the husband, distinctly forbids deviations from this national law on certain points? Fiore justly remarks that a dualism which goes so far as to deal with the marriage itself on the principles of the national law of the parties, while the law of their property is to be determined by the law of the domicile, would be intolerable.^{21 22 23}

¹⁷ So e.g. Molinæus; J. Voet, de stat. §§ 18-20; Abraham a Wesel, De commb. bon societ. Tract i. §§ 115-119; Cochin, Œuvres, ii. p. 47.

¹⁸ § 33; see, too, Thol, § 44.

¹⁹ See, for instance, Haus, § 119, on the theory of a tacit contract.

²¹ If the legal rules affecting the disposal of the property of married persons are to be traced to a tacit contract, and based on such a contract, the inclination will be to apply the law of the domicile which the husband intends to acquire immediately after the marriage is

The only theory which is then left upon a sound basis is that which is insisted on by Italian jurists with special force, and which sees in the law of the property of married persons simply a deduction from the law of marriage of the nation to which the parties belong.²⁴ This conception differs little, except in form of expression, from that which I adopted in my earlier edition of this book. It may be urged against it, that it not infrequently makes it possible for the parties concerned to be misled, since the law of their domicile is more familiar to them than the law of their nationality, when they are entering on their marriage. We may concede that people may be so misled, and frequently are. But then the opposite view leads to the greatest uncertainty in the judgments of the courts, as is shown by the division among the adherents of the domicile theory. Against these more or less arbitrary doctrines of the courts²⁵ there is no remedy, except in an actual contract of marriage, to regulate the property of the spouses, while the fact is that such contracts are not the fashion everywhere, or from considerations of delicacy are not entered into. On the other hand, any man who has a definite sentiment of nationality will, in all questions of family law, if he thinks on the subject at all, as a general rule think and feel in the spirit of that nationality.

LIMITATIONS ON THE PERSONAL LAW. REGARD PAID TO THE lex rei sitæ IN EXCEPTIONAL CASES.

§ 183. We must, however, note a certain limitation, which must be imposed both in the cases in which the law of the nation, and those in which the law of the domicile, is taken as the ruling law. The subjection concluded, provided always that he has sufficiently revealed his intention to the wife or to her guardian. But this theory, which has often been stated, becomes untenable if the theory of a tacit contract is rejected. That being so, if the law of the domicile is taken as the rule, it must be the domicile which really existed at the time of the marriage, or the domicile which the parties last had, as the case may be.

²² The Institute for International Law, on the subject of the marriage law, in their resolutions at Lausanne in 1888 adopted, in article 14, the theory which prevails in the existing French system. The law of the first matrimonial domicile is to be applied, unless the circumstances clearly disclose some other view in the view of the parties.

²³ I may remark in passing that I did not, as Clunet (J. iii. p. 182) certainly thinks, in my first edition incline to commit the judgment of the matter to lex domicilii. The terminology of the subject is not yet fully established, but I have used the term lex domicilii as equivalent to the personal law.

²⁴ The German Juristentag (Trans. xviii. 2, p. 141) pronounced in favour of this view.

of real estate, which lies beyond the territory, to the personal law of the spouses, presupposes that the personal law itself holds the theory of the unity of the assets that make up the property of the married persons. If each individual asset constitutes a separate estate, the fate of which is absolutely apart from that of all the rest of the person's estate, we can scarcely in such a case hold that the personal law intended to regulate property beyond the territory, in dealing with the law of the property of the spouses. According to the principles of the Germanic law, it is not maintained that each particular thing constitutes a separate estate, and indeed the moveable property is regarded as a whole. But each separate piece of real estate is recognised as a special aggregate of property, to which different rules of succession, for instance the feudal rules, may be applied, while the moveable property descends in another channel. By older German law, and by the law of England at the present day, in which these principles are retained, the right of married persons in their property is looked upon as an acquisition of rights in separate things, excepting always the moveables, which represent the personality of the husband in quite a peculiar sense, and are therefore conceived as present at his domicile.²⁶ In accordance with this theory, real estate follows the lex rei sitæ, moveables the lex domicilii, whereas, according to Roman law, where all property, without distinction between real and personal estate, constitutes a universitas, both constituent parts of the estate are subjected solely to the lex domicilii. In this way we account for the practice of the English common law, and for the circumstance that the older French authors, who have concerned themselves specially with the conflict of law in the matter of matrimonial property, fall into two classes. The one class keeps in view the coutumes with the Germanic conception of property, and supports on that account the general application of the lex rei sitæ; the other class, more familiar with the Roman law, rests upon the lex domicilii.²⁷

We cannot, however, infer from the fact that a system of law, in dealing with the subject of matrimonial rights in property, draws a distinction between moveable and immoveable estate, that the Germanic idea of property is at the bottom of this system. The introduction or retention of this distinction may very likely be nothing more than an anomaly which is justified by practical considerations. For instance, it may be that all the moveable goods, which the spouses had before their marriage, fall under the communio bonorum, while real property does not, just because the former can so easily be brought together in the household of the spouses, and for this reason, as a matter of fact, cannot easily be separated one article from another.

²⁶ "Mobilia personam sequuntur."

The true test is rather to look at the theory of the law of succession.²⁸

When the law of succession sets up an universal succession,²⁹ the Roman conception of the property as a whole has penetrated deeply, and this conception is no more disturbed by the fact that some, or, it may be, all the real estate is subjected to a special treatment by the law of matrimonial property, than it is in Roman law by reason of the special treatment accorded to the Fundus dotalis in contradistinction to the moveable subjects, which are given to the man in dotem. Thus, for instance, in the law of France, although in the Communauté there is a line drawn between moveable and immoveable things, we find proof of the existence of that theory, according to which the personal statute supplies the rule, just as it does in the Preussisches Allgemeines Landrecht.

But, in order to justify the application of the personal law of the spouses to foreign real estate, it is indispensable that the personal statute and the lex rei sitæ should both hold the doctrine that the estate must be treated as an unity. If the former knows nothing of this doctrine, it will lay down no rules that will affect foreign heritage; and if the lex rei sitæ does not recognise it, it will treat the right of property given by marriage as a real right in the particular thing which is subject to the lex rei sitæ and to no other law.³⁰ It is therefore quite impossible to decide the dispute in a way which shall be universally applicable.^{31 32}

²⁸ See below on the law of succession.

³² It must further be noted that, if the lex rei sitæ prescribes particular forms for the transmission of real rights, rights of the one spouse over the property of the other, which are given by their personal law, can only be made effectual as an actio personalis until these forms are complied with. This has been noticed by old writers. Burgundus, i. 15, 16, 37; P. Voet, vi. 3, § 9; Rodenburg, ii. c. 5, § 9; Christianæus, Dec. ii. § 57 (see in the same sense Haus, § 125; Stobbe, § 34, note 16). What has been said is also, of course, true of the statutory hypothec of the wife over the husband's property.

The objection may further be taken, that the regulation of the rights of property of married persons, if, and so far as, in accordance with what we have said, this is to be guided by the lex rei sitæ, on the one hand is at variance with what is probably the desire of the parties, and thereby may cause the greatest inconvenience; while, on the other hand, the husband, if he should have the power of alienating landed property, or investing sums of money in such property, will, by reason of the variety in the land laws of different countries, have a dangerous power of settling as he pleases what law is to regulate the property of the spouses, and what rights each is to have in it. The first argument rests upon a circle. Parties are not entitled to hold that the lex domicilii is universally applicable if one of the spouses possesses foreign estate, and it cannot be proved that they proceeded upon this assumption; at least, the opposite may be just as easily assumed. The second argument is much more a description of the effect of the rights which the husband originally had in the subjects which he alienates, than of the consequences of our theory as to the conflict of laws. If he cannot by the lex rei sitæ alienate landed property, and by the lex domicilii cannot change the investments of the funds without his wife's consent, then this dangerous power is fully excluded. If the application of the lex rei sitæ is sound, the whole matter stands precisely as in the case where within the territory of one and the same system of law there are particular regulations as to the property of spouses in particular kinds of estate, e.g. manorial or peasant holdings. These are treated in such a case as separate estates.

Our view is confirmed by the fact that many authors,³³ who take the lex domicilii as the general rule, make an exception in the case where there is some prohibitive statute—e.g. a statute whereby the community of goods does not extend to property acquired by inheritance—in force. In the cases contemplated by these authors, the result no doubt shows that the lex rei sitæ is to be preferred, but not because the law that interferes is a prohibitive statute. For a statute of that kind can have no other object than the interest of the subjects of the State to which it belongs, so that it does not affect strangers who possess property there; an instance is the Roman law, which forbids donations between spouses.³⁴ The true reason lies in this, that the limitations which these authors have in view have their origin in the older German law, and have no further meaning than to ensure the rights of the nearest heirs in the estate. But no one has ever doubted that this is regulated by the lex rei sitæ.³⁵

³³ Bouhier, cap. 26, No. 19; Burgundus, as cited; Boullenois, pp. 753, 796, 797.

³⁴ See infra, § 187. Wächter, ii. pp. 362, 198, roundly asserts the application of the lex domicilii, because an authoritative statute as to the property of married persons has regard not to things within its own territory, but to persons, and in doubt must be held to take cognisance of none but its own subjects.

³⁵ A judgment of the Court of Cassation of Paris, 4th May 1829 (Sirey, xxx. 1, p. 191), affirming one of the Cour Royale at Rouen, declares the 329th and 330th articles of the Coutumes of Normandy, which only allow a certain part of the conquêts of the wife to pass to the spouses, to be real statutes, which are to be applied to foreign spouses who, by the law of

CAN THE LAW OF THE SPOUSES' PROPERTY UNDERGO A CHANGE, OR CAN IT NOT?

§ 184. What, however, is to be the result if the spouses, after contracting marriage, change their personal law, i.e. alter their nationality or domicile, as the case may be? Does such a change carry with it an alteration in the law applicable to their property, in respect that that law is dependent on the personal law?

Practical jurists have busied themselves a good deal over this question as to whether the law of married persons' property changes or does not,³⁶ and there has also been much theoretical discussion of the subject, but there has not as yet been an unanimous answer returned to the question. Those who refer the positive law of married persons' property to a tacit agreement, say that it cannot undergo any change, for agreements cannot be set aside by a change of nationality or of domicile.³⁷ It may be that the expediency of having the law of married persons' property preserved from change has done something to bolster up the theory of a tacit agreement. For, if the law of property as between the spouses is transformed with every change of domicile or of nationality, many difficulties are, in the view of most authorities, at once raised, and the rights of the wife are very apt to be put at the mercy of her husband's caprice.

their domicile, live in complete community of goods. The reasons assigned for this, viz. "Le statut est personnel, lorsqu'il régle directement et principalement la capacité ou l'incapacité générale des personnes pour contracter — le statut est réel, lorsqu'il a principalement et directement les biens pour objet," certainly do not warrant the result. Stobbe, § 34, note 14, has attached himself to the view worked out in the text, with full recognition of the exceptions that must be recognised where the lex rei sitæ is applicable.

By the law of England, land situated in England is not affected by any other marriage law than that of England; the law of the domicile at the date of the marriage, i.e. of the husband's domicile, or of a domicile acquired by him immediately thereafter, which at the date of the marriage he had in view to acquire, will regulate the rights of the spouses in moveable property. This is also the law of Scotland (Fraser, 1323, 1324); and conversely, real estate situated out of England or Scotland, as the case may be, is not subject to any of the rules of English or Scottish law to any effect, and specially with regard to the present topic, is not subject to be affected by the rule of English or Scottish law as to the property or administration of married persons' estate, or the succession of the survivor at the dissolution of the marriage.

It has been held by the French courts that, in determining whether the provisions made by a predeceasing husband in favour of his widow do or do not exceed one-fourth of his whole estate, which is the limit set by French law to his powers, it is incompetent to take into account real estate situated abroad (Leroy de Chaumont, 1879; Trib. Civ. de la Seine, J. vi. p. 549). As to the effect of an English marriage-contract upon the succession of the spouses, when that succession opens in France, cf. the case of Noireterre (1881, J. viii. p. 529) decided by the civil tribunal of Albi (see infra, note 97, p. 426).

³⁷ No doubt it has been said, on the other hand, that even with a theory of tacit agreement, we may suppose a new agreement at every change of domicile. This suggestion is not, however, very scientific.

At the present day, there is no doubt that the theory which asserts that there can be no change is adopted by the great weight of opinion.³⁸ But there is no want of respectable authority in favour of there being a change in the law,³⁹ a theory which is in particular recognised by the practice of the United States.⁴⁰

As we have seen, the theory of a tacit agreement cannot be invoked to set up the doctrine that the law of the property of the spouses is subject to no change. But, as has been already aptly said by Savigny [§ 379, Guthrie, p. 296], if, and in so far as, the law of the new domicile holds that parties may effect for themselves changes on the common law applicable to their property, this provision can only be applied to the marriages of such persons as, at the time of their marriage, already belonged to the State, whereas the law of the older domicile intended to regulate permanently the relations of the spouses in regard to their property.⁴¹ It must be held that the only object of the law in the former case is to settle questions of property that arise in the case of marriages of persons belonging to its own country; while, on the other hand, we must concede at least the same enduring force to the statutory provisions which take the place of a contract, as we should undoubtedly be obliged to concede to a contract.⁴² In the opposite view, the relations of the spouses as regards their property would be thrown into the greatest uncertainty, particularly as regards the wife, since the husband has, to a certain extent, the uncontrolled power of altering his wife's domicile and his own.⁴³

If it is urged, in support of the proposal to determine the law of the property of the spouses⁴⁴ by the law of the new domicile,⁴⁵ that on the one hand there is no such tacit contract, and, on the other, if there is no special contract, then the law of the property of married persons is a consequence of the law of the place; and so, when the spouses emigrate to another country, where another law prevails, they must be taken to submit themselves to a new system;—the first statement is, no doubt, correct in itself, but not fit to meet the reasoning of Savigny just quoted; the second is incorrect, because it necessarily involves an assumption which is not proved, and which our previous reasoning shows to be wrong, to the effect that the law of the new domicile will innovate upon rights of property already

⁴² Gerber, D. Privatr. § 229: "It is a necessary result of the relations of the spouses in matters of property, that where we have a marriage recognised by law we have not merely the possibility of the application of particular rules of law, but also a positive and enduring shape given to all the relations of the spouses in matters of property, from which a whole series of mutual rights and obligations arise; these legal relations resulting from a marriage are not subject to the operation of the code of the country in any other sense than every legal relation is, and in particular it does not follow that because they were originally established by the law of the domicile that when the husband shifts his domicile it is transformed into the shape prescribed by the law of that new domicile."

established, and that the law of the former domicile did not intend to fix permanently what the relations of the spouses should be as regards their property.⁴⁶

An intermediate theory proposes to subject all property acquired after the change of domicile to the law of the new domicile, and leaves the law of the former one to rule all property acquired before that change.⁴⁷ In support of this there is cited the doctrine, which we have already refuted, that the permanent dependence of all questions of property between the spouses upon the law of the first domicile can only be justified by the assumption—an erroneous assumption—of a tacit contract; and then those who would make the lex rei sitæ the rule, adduce this consideration, that in the eye of the law moveables are always situated at the actual domicile of the party in right of them. But this second consideration does not support the intermediate theory, but rather the second theory, which does not except the property already acquired by the spouses from the law of the new domicile; it is not, however, well founded, for the rule "mobilia ossibus inhaerent" merely signifies that in certain circumstances moveables, according to the laws of all civilised peoples, constitute an universitas. This intermediate view is, besides, quite unscientific. It forgets that the principle of community of goods extends not merely to the existing estate, but also to what may be subsequently acquired, and in attempting to avoid inconveniences on the one side, this doctrine raises up all the more on the other. E.g. the wife has had to share with her husband an inheritance which fell to her, because the law of her domicile at the date of the succession so directed: a succession now opens to the husband: he keeps the jus quæsitum he had in the half of the first succession; but, in accordance with the law recognised at their new domicile, the wife gets nothing at all from the succession which has fallen to her husband.

If, in the first place, it is contended, in opposition to the theory we have adopted, that parties contracting with married persons are entitled to rely upon the legal conditions of that relation as recognised at the seat of their existing domicile,⁴⁸ we cannot affirm this contention, unless every marriage which is celebrated in that country necessarily involves the statutory relations of that country as regards property, or, if it is celebrated elsewhere, can only continue to subsist in that country under these relations;⁴⁹ or unless there is some special publication required of any modification or exclusion of the statutory legal relations between spouses; and in the latter case, too, the proposed rule would only affect the claims of creditors against the spouses, and not the rights of the spouses against each other.⁵⁰

If the legal relations between the spouses do not take their rise from the date of celebration of the marriage, but are associated with some more remote event, such as the birth of a child, it is the domicile which the spouses had at the date of the marriage, not that which they had when this event occurred, that rules. The marriage was constituted at the former, not at the latter place; and the place at which the condition is purified can be of no more importance here than in any conditional contract.⁵¹

RESTRICTIONS ON THE LEGAL CAPACITY OF THE WIFE NOT TO BE CONFUSED WITH LIMITATIONS PLACED UPON THE WIFE'S POWER OF DISPOSAL
BY REASON OF THE HUSBAND'S RIGHTS.

§ 185. We must not, however, confuse the invalidity of a transaction entered into by a married woman without her husband's consent—a consequence of the husband's rights over the wife's property—with the invalidity of a legal act, arising from some incapacity of a married woman to act. This incapacity, which as a rule is only partial, may very well take its rise, simply from the fact of marriage, and exist for the married woman only so long as the marriage lasts. We must, then, consider the position

Handelsr. 25, p. 548, and Introduction, p. 568), takes up the principle of the possibility of altering the law of matrimonial property—in accordance with the law of the domicile—in a peculiar fashion, with the object of bringing about an assimilation of immigrant families with native born. But it would not be possible in that case to recognise the validity of contracts concluded abroad, and in all probability the object which is sought to be attained will not be reached at all, but rather will result in confusion when it is attempted to set it in operation.

⁴⁹ In this case the law of the new domicile will be applied (Wächter, ii. p. 55; Savigny, § 379; Guthrie, pp. 296, 297). See, too, the judgment of the Court at Celle, cited in note 1 ad fin.

⁵⁰ Cf. judgment of the Supreme Court at Berlin, 26th October 1860 (Seuffert, 14, p. 340): "When intimation is required as a necessity, the law of the territory must be recognised to this effect, that so long as this intimation is not given the spouses must be held, so far as their relation to others is concerned, to be living in the ordinary community of goods. This ruling law must also be applied to married persons coming from a foreign country." It is also urged that the judge cannot be expected to know the law of the former domicile. See, on the other hand, Schäffner, pp. 142, 143. By the law of Hamburg, contracts of marriage are of no force in questions with creditors, except it should happen that the wife possesses some separate estate acquired from a third party (Baumeister, Hamburg. Privatrecht, ii. p. 95). As the judgment of the Supreme Court of Germany already cited notes, the necessity for the publication of a foreign marriage law which differs from that of the country is by no means obvious without special enactment. As to the means of giving effect to claims by the wife in case of bankruptcy, see the law of bankruptcy.

carefully: Is the legal act ineffectual because of some right in the other spouse, as a rule, the husband, or is it invalid on account of an incapacity to act in the contracting party?

We must not confuse the invalidity of transactions entered into by the wife without her husband's consent, which is a consequence of the right which the husband has over his wife's property, with the invalidity of any transaction which depends upon the incapacity of the woman to act for herself. The former is regulated by the law of the original domicile; but the woman's incapacity, and the statutory guardianship exercised by her husband, must be settled by the law of their domicile at the time the transaction was entered into.⁵² It is to the neglect of this distinction, which has now been sharply brought out in the practice of the German Imperial Court,⁵³ that the origin of many of the divergent theories, to which we have already referred, may be traced.⁵⁴

ENACTMENTS FOR PUBLIC POLICY.

§ 186. It may happen, too, that the later personal law contains provisions for the modification or suspension, as the case may be, of the matrimonial law of property which call for application in the interests of public policy, and especially in the interest of the creditors of the spouses, to each and every married person who has a residence in the country, or who belongs to it as a citizen. The application of such an absolute provision is, of course, not in any sense interfered with by the circumstance that the law of property between the spouses is in itself subject to the legal system of some nationality or domicile which the spouses at some previous time enjoyed. In this way a judgment of the German Imperial Court (ii. Sen.) of 7th October 1884 (Entsch. xii. p. 309) found and declared the 1443rd article of the Baden Landrecht (Code Civ.), whereby any suspension of the matrimonial community of goods was required to be judicial, to be an absolutely universal proposition, applicable to all married persons living in the country.⁵⁵

⁵² So, too, judgment of the Supreme Court at Berlin, 19th December 1859 (Seuffert, xiv. No. 4). If we take nationality as the criterion on this matter—the proper course, as I think—we should not regard the courts of the domicile as competent even to give any ratification that might be required to supplement the wife's capacity. (So Gianzana, i. § 98.) The rules of jurisdiction of the courts of law would in many cases shut out the possibility of applying foreign law by the courts of the domicile.

⁵⁵ See, to the same effect, Arntz: Rev. xii. p. 324. Weiss, p. 680; and Beauchet, Jour. xii. p. 39; Jour. xiii. p. 723, think, on the other hand, that they find in that article of the code merely a personal statute, which is not to be applied to spouses who have married under a law of matrimonial property to a different effect.

NOTE L ON §§ 184-186. RESULT OF CHANGE OF DOMICILE.

[Lord Fraser (Husband and Wife, p. 1326) thus states the question raised in the foregoing paragraph: "Suppose a husband not entitled jure mariti to carry off all his wife's personal estate by the law of the matrimonial domicile, can he, to whom the law gives the power of changing the domicile at pleasure, do so to the effect of subjecting the wife's property to a law by which it is assigned to him? . . . Can her husband change the domicile from England to Scotland, and demand all the personal estate as belonging to him, in virtue of the jus mariti given him by the law of the new domicile, and plead that the English statute" (limiting his rights in certain kinds of personal estate) "was a local law which had no extra-territorial force? There is no decision to this effect, and the contrary is maintained by eminent jurists, who are very decided on one point—that if such change of domicile does enlarge the husband's powers over the wife's property, this will apply only to property acquired by her subsequent to the change, and will not divest her of property which had been held by her in her own right under the law of the matrimonial domicile." By the phrase "matrimonial domicile" in this passage is meant the domicile of the husband at the time of the marriage, or the domicile adopted by the spouses immediately after the date of the marriage, and in their view when it was contracted. The authorities quoted by his lordship—viz. Westlake, p. 71; 1 Burge, 626; Savigny, § 396; Wharton, § 198; Story, § 187; Bishop on the Law of Married Women, vol. ii. § 565, and the American cases cited there—would probably be sufficient to determine the decision of any case that may occur in Scotland. In questions as to the rights of spouses and children on the death of one of the spouses, the law of the domicile at the time when the succession opens will settle English and Scottish cases (Hog v. Lashley, 1804, 1 Robertson Sc. App. c. 4; Westlake, pp. 73, 74; Fraser, p. 1325). The Court of Aix (Jour. ix. p. 541) decided that a wife who has, by marrying a man of a particular nationality, once acquired certain rights in spe as his widow cannot afterwards lose them by a change of nationality on the part of her husband.]

LIMITATIONS ON THE FREEDOM OF CONTRACT OF THE SPOUSES: DONATIONS BETWEEN THE SPOUSES.

§ 187. The positive law of the spouses in not a few instances restrains the power of the spouses to contract with each other. These are cases of limitation of capacity, and accordingly the personal law of the spouses must be exclusively applied, and the personal law which the spouses enjoyed at the date of the act in question.⁵⁶ The first of these

⁵⁶ On this subject many illustrations may no doubt be given which create doubt, e.g. according to a marriage contract concluded in France, the husband had a right to the wife's wages. If, then, the spouses afterwards settle in England, can the wife appeal against her limitations is the prohibition of donations between the spouses,⁵⁷ which existed in the Roman law. If such a prohibition exists according to the lex rei sitæ, it is not to be applied to married persons domiciled in another country, for this reason, that this prohibition exists for the purpose of maintaining the moral integrity of the married state, and that can certainly not be matter of concern to any Government other than that to which the persons of the spouses belong.⁵⁸ If, then, to take an instance, a married couple domiciled in Vienna, where donation is not prohibited, make one to the other a donation of an immoveable estate,⁵⁹ which lies in some country where Roman law is observed, this donation is good, and conversely it is null if the immoveable estate lies in Vienna, while the domicile of the marriage is in Hannover, where Roman law prevails.

The explanation of the difference in the theory of many of the older authorities, to which, too, some of the more modern writers have attached themselves, is that, as Argentraeus correctly says,⁶⁰ they confuse this prohibition of donations between spouses—a provision of the Roman law—with the rights of the next heirs, which are founded on principles of Germanic law; the protection given to these rights is often described in particular systems of law as a prohibition of donations. But the touchstone of the distinction is this, that the donation of the Roman law, if it is not recalled, is confirmed by the death of the giver,⁶¹ and is quite admissible before marriage, while the prohibition of the German law makes any donation, even mortis causa, invalid, and invalid even if made before celebration of the marriage, e.g. between persons betrothed. The views of these older writers are, therefore, in relation to the statutes which were before them, quite correct in their results,⁶² while the theory by which all possible benefactions⁶³ from the one spouse to the other are subjected to the lex domicilii, leaves out of account the prohibitions of Germanic law, which are entirely different.

In the paper in J. viii. p. 47, præs. pp. 54, 55, the question is answered in the affirmative, because the provision of the English law is essentiellement d'ordre public," v. Martens answers it in the negative on the ground that the law of married persons' property is unalterable, § 73 ad fin.

The question, too, as to whether spouses can alter existing contracts of marriage after they are married, or can substitute contract for common law provisions to regulate their property,⁶⁴ is to be settled by the law of the domicile which the spouses had,⁶⁵ at the time of the alteration in question.⁶⁶ Foreign spouses are not fettered in this matter by the fact of having property in this country.

The prohibition against alienation of the fundus dotalis,⁶⁷ which existed in Roman law, is in the same way a special case of true incapacity to act. In this case the spouses are in truth, unless in exceptional circumstances, incapacitated from disposing of one asset of their property inter vivos. The consequence is that such a prohibition, found to exist according to the lex rei sitæ, will not extend to foreign spouses, by the laws of whose own country alienation of this asset is allowed. The special protection, which the law desires to give the spouses in this matter, cannot be extended to foreigners, whose own law looks upon such protection as superfluous or mischievous. Conversely, alienation will be regarded as null, not upon any logical ground, it is true, but according to the law of custom which has been adopted on the continent of Europe,⁶⁸ in cases in which only the personal law of the spouses pronounces it to be so.⁶⁹

We find an analogy in the case of a person who, in accordance with the common law of Rome, is declared by a rescript of the sovereign to be of full age. Such a person may dispose of all his other property without restraint, but may not alienate landed estate.⁷⁰

⁶³ So, too, the modern German authorities. See Savigny, as cited.

⁶⁴ Demangeat, as cited; J. Voet, 23, 2, § 87; Bouhier, chap. xxii. No. 95. Cf. Code Civil, art. 1394: "Toutes conventions matrimoniales seront rédigées avant le mariage par acte devant notaires." 1395: "Elles ne peuvent recevoir aucun changement après la célébration du mariage." Fœlix is of a different opinion; see, too, report of a judgment of the Cour d'Appel de Limoges, 8th Aug. 1809; Sirey, ix. 2, p. 386.

⁶⁶ Bouhier, cap. 20, No. 150; Beauchet, J. xi. p. 39; Folleville, p. 113. On the other hand, Raoul Jay (J. xii. p. 52) improperly treats the question as a part of the régime matrimonial, to be determined therefore by the law of the first matrimonial domicile.

⁶⁷ Cf. Code Civil, § 1554.

On the other hand, the question whether property in a fundus dotalis can be acquired by prescription, depends, not upon the lex domicilii, but upon the lex rei sitæ.⁷¹

REGULATION OF THE PROPERTY OF SPOUSES BY CONTRACT.

§ 188. It is the prevailing opinion that the import of the marriage contract (pactum nuptiale), which determines the rights of property between the spouses, should be settled by the law of the domicile of the husband at the celebration of the marriage,⁷² and on this point many, who take nationality as their rule in other matters, are of opinion that the guiding principle should be domicile. As a matter of principle, however, we must on this point also hold that nationality is the proper guide. We must, however, admit that circumstances may very easily occur to justify us in supposing that, in so far as the spouses were at all at liberty to make a contract for themselves, they desired that their contract should be supplemented on points that were not fully expressed, or should be interpreted by some other positive law; and then, in a matter like a marriage contract, the practical result will very often be (in so far as the law of the husband's nationality gives him freedom of contract) that the lex domicilii will carry the day, as so often happens in other contracts. Protracted domicile at the place, it may be, to which the bride by nationality belongs, or in which she is domiciled; ignorance on the part of the bride, or of her guardian, of the law of the husband's nationality; and the employment of expressions which are peculiar to the legal language of the domicile, possibly an engagement by the husband to continue to remain permanently at the bride's domicile,⁷³

he is misled by the principle of the so-called "ordre public." His view is that the judex domicilii (i.e. the judge who by the personal law is the proper judge) cannot interfere with property of the spouses which is situated in another country.

⁷¹ See below the law of things, and Aubry et Rau, § 31, note 20. We must take care not to confound the Roman prohibition against alienation of the fundus dotalis with the prohibitions which we find in German law against the alienation of particular estates, which prohibition arose from the rights of the next heirs. The judgment of the French Court of Cassation of 17th Feb. 1817, reported in Sirey, xvii. i. p. 421, pronounced the statute, which was once recognised in Normandy, by which a wife séparée de biens could only alienate her fundus dotalis with judicial permission, and after consulting her nearest relations, to be a real statute, and therefore held (before the publication of the Code) that a sale of such an estate by a married woman domiciled in Paris was null. Cf. Boullenois, i. pp. 739, 750, 798, 799.

[This is assumed to be the rule of the law of Scotland in the leading case of Earl of Stair v. Head, 1844, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. vi. 905. But it is decided in that case that spouses domiciled in one country may select the law of another as the law that shall construe their contract. Even although spouses may not have expressly made such a selection, it would appear that an inference to that effect may be drawn from the language of the contract, if it shall disclose an intention to live in a particular country, and to be ruled by its law.]

will all incline the scale towards the decision of the matter according to the lex domicilii. The case we have now under consideration is quite different from the case in which no special contract has been made. When parties make no contract, they allow the general rules of international law to decide, and these pronounce in our view for the law of the nationality. When parties make a contract, they introduce their own individual wills to a certain extent as factors in the case, and may quite properly demand that this individual declaration of intention should be considered in the light of the circumstances of the individual case. There will be much less reference made to the place where the contract was concluded to discover its meaning,⁷⁴ since, in the case of a contract of marriage, bona fides does not require the parties to subject themselves to the lex loci actus. (Cf. infra on obligatory contracts.) The same may be said of the obligation of the husband to repay the dos which he receives.

The independent obligations of third persons,⁷⁵ however, and the obligations undertaken by the future wife before her marriage, can only be determined by the law of their respective domiciles; in the case of the wife, because it is only after celebration of the marriage that the wife follows her husband; before this, the position of husband and wife as contracting parties is equal.⁷⁶

Marriage contracts are, upon the whole, to be dealt with like other obligatory contracts.⁷⁷ From this it follows that the interpretation of doubtful expressions must, as a general rule, be taken in the sense which the law of the place of the execution of the contract attaches to them.⁷⁸ If the lex rei sitæ requires a special form⁷⁹ to constitute a real right which it has been undertaken in a marriage contract to grant—e.g. the registration in a public register—the right in question can only be acquired by observing this form, although a personal action for the right so promised may be brought upon the contract directly.⁸⁰

⁷⁶ Gand, No. 671. [So decided by the House of Lords in Cooper, see supra, p. 310.]

⁷⁹ The rule "locus regit actum" has application in this connection, but of course only as a permissive rule. From the fact that it is merely permissive it follows that a contract, which satisfies the forms required by the national law of both parties, is valid. Cf. art. 13 of regulations adopted by the Institute of International Law at Lausanne in 1888.

§ 189. Some doubt is created by supposing a case where the husband immediately after the celebration of the marriage changes his domicile,⁸¹ and settles, we shall suppose, at what was the domicile of his wife. The law of the new domicile must rule, although in the general case it is the actual domicile, and not one which is yet to be acquired, which must decide; we justify the exception by the consideration that the contract has for its subject a permanent relation which will continue to subsist in every sense in the new domicile, and that the law of any country as to marriage contracts cannot be applied to marriages which are not to be carried out there at all; this holds in cases where the intention of taking up the new domicile was announced at the time of the execution of the marriage contract,⁸² and where there can be, in the circumstances, no inference of any intention to come under the provisions of the law of the former domicile.⁸³

Marriage contracts may very well contain provisions, which may be characterised as true contracts of succession: in that case, these provisions can only be defended against the unconditional rights of heirs ab intestato, or against the rights of heirs who take by some provision of law [as in the case of legitims], according to the rules of that legal system which is to be taken as determining the law of succession, be that the law of the last domicile, or of the last nationality.⁸⁴

We can also deduce, from the fact that the rule "locus regit actum" is merely permissive, the following rule, viz.: In so far as the husband undertakes unilateral obligations, if there is a plain intention on his part to impose on himself a binding obligation, we must always affirm the validity of the obligation, so far as form goes, if it is in accordance with the rules of his own law. Any other view would give him the widest opportunity of deceiving his wife.⁸⁵

DISSOLUTION OF THE MARRIAGE. SECOND MARRIAGE.

§ 190. Except in so far as the lex rei sitæ prevails,⁸⁶ the rules of the first personal law which the spouses had in common will settle what rights right sought to be conferred is declared by the lex rei sitæ to be inadmissible (e.g. Dominium pro diviso in an estate which the law says shall not be divided), or the disposition itself in the contract contradicts this, and proposes to treat the subject in question as a separate estate. (The usual expression, "prohibitive statute," is not apt; see supra, § 33.)

⁸¹ Cf. Pothier, de la communauté, Nos. 15, 16.

⁸³ E.g. where the spouses propose to emigrate to a country foreign to both of them, with whose law they are unacquainted. It is different if the husband goes to the place where the wife is already domiciled.

⁸⁴ Supreme Court of App. Lubeck, 17th November 1874. Seuffert, 32, § 105.

⁸⁶ See, for instance, Stephen, ii. p. 403, on the Courtesy of England. Lehr, Dr. Ang. § 182.

the surviving spouse has in the property of the deceased, or in the goods falling under the communio after the death of the predeceasing; provided that is to say, that they are the immediate results of the law applicable to the property of the spouses during the subsistence of the marriage;⁸⁷ as, for instance, where there has been a *communio*⁸⁸ bonorum, and at the dissolution of the marriage, the property hitherto held in common falls in whole or in part to the surviving husband, or the wife retains the management and life interest enjoyment of all the property of the spouses after her husband's death.⁸⁹ Both of these are results of the disappearance of one partner in the society that existed, in the latter case of the partner who had the whole right of management.⁹⁰ Ordinary cases of succession are determined, when the lex rei sitæ does not assert itself, by the rules of the last personal law which the deceased had.⁹¹

Since divorce and its consequences can only be decreed by the court of the country whose law actually regulates the personal status of the parties, the consequences of a dissolution of marriage, in so far as they are penal, can only be determined by that law. That is, for instance, true of the purely arbitrary punishments of the Roman law, which have no necessary connection with the Roman law of dowry.⁹² For other purposes the law which regulates the relations of the spouses in other matters of property is decisive here also.⁹³

⁹³ If the parties, while a process of divorce is in dependence, shall change their personal law, then the results of the divorce which could not be determined by the sentence of divorce, or which it has not, by reason of the tenor of parties' pleadings, determined, must be determined by the subsequent personal law, i.e. by the personal law which the divorced spouses had at the time when the sentence of divorce first began to take effect. Cf. judgment of the German Imperial Court (iv.) of 27th May 1881 (Entsch. v. No. 54, p. 193). By omitting to plead, it may possibly be that a party has intended to renounce his or her rights.

The effect of a second marriage in the same way, in so far as the lex rei sitæ does not interfere and assert its claim, or the question does not become one as to property inherited from the predeceasing spouse, is to be ruled by the law of the first personal law of that marriage; but in so far as the law gives the children of the first marriage the right to require payment or security for payment of what the surviving spouse inherited from the predecessor, all questions must be settled by the law under which the children acquired these rights; in this way, the question as to whether a dos or donatio propter nuptias of the Roman law falls to the children, will be settled by the law of the original personal statute of the first marriage; and, on the other hand, the question as to whether the property passing by inheritance from the deceased spouse to the parens binubus is to be refunded on his or her re-marriage, must be settled by the law of the last domicile of the parens prædefunctus.⁹⁴ For although it is true that the children of the first marriage do not claim the goods that have fallen to the parens binubus on the footing of intestacy,⁹⁵ it is also true that this parens binubus has only been allowed to acquire these on the understanding that he shall not marry again; and, again, the obvious end of all such provisions—viz. to protect the children of the first marriage against the new spouse and the children, if there shall be any, of the second marriage⁹⁶—demands that the law of the domicile afterwards acquired by the parens binubus shall be excluded, to the end that the rights of the children shall not be left to depend entirely upon the pleasure of that parent. Whether the second spouse can take anything by succession is, on the other hand, dependent upon the law which governs the succession to the estate of the parens binubus, and therefore in certain circumstances upon the lex rei sitæ.⁹⁷

Lastly, the rules of the personal law of the new spouse must decide ⁹⁴ Or by the lex rei sitæ, if this is the law that rules the intestate succession of the predeceasing spouse.

⁹⁵ A judgment of the Supreme Court at Berlin, 3rd May 1853 (Decisions, 25, p. 373), makes the law of the place where the second marriage took place decisive; for the penalties upon a second marriage do not depend upon general principles of law, but upon considerations of morality, expediency, or convenience. No doubt there is much to be said for the view which regards it as a case of intestacy resting upon a tacit assumption as to what the predecessor would have wished, and consequently a resolutive condition by virtue of which the advantages which the survivor has enjoyed are lost by entering into a second marriage. At variance with this, however, is L. 5, § 1, C. de sec. nupt. 5, 9, which provides that children shall have a claim upon the lucra nuptialia, if they have not succeeded to the estate of the parens prædefunctus, and shall lose the right if they are ungrateful to the parens binubus; see also No. 22, c. 1, and c. 46, whereby Justinian's law is not to apply to persons married before the date of the law. This judgment was pronounced upon a claim by children of a first marriage to property which the mater binuba had inherited from her first husband. Justinian's provisions are so arbitrary that no argument can be drawn from the transitory provisions in No. 22, c. 1, and c. 46.

⁹⁶ Cf. Seuffert, Comment. i. p. 243.

⁹⁷ Abraham a Wesel, ad. No. Const. Ultraj. art. 10, § 138; J. Voet, in Dig. 23, 2, § 136; Boullenois, i. pp. 806-809; and Boubier, chap. 34, No. 41, declare in favour of the lex rei sitæ.

[The French courts have held that an English marriage-contract must be read according to the rules of French law, quoad its testamentary provisions, if the succession opens in France exclusively as to the rights which children have in his or her property.⁹⁸ The limitations imposed in cases of intestacy, and upon the dispositive power of a testator—whereby, for instance, one spouse cannot, where there are children, give by his last will more than a certain proportion to the other, are, as a rule, to be determined by the law which governs the succession in question.⁹⁹ In this way we can account for the fact that the older writers who touch this question, and who have, as a rule, the purely German institution of the rights of the next heirs in view, apply the lex rei sitæ.¹⁰⁰

SUPPLEMENTARY PARAGRAPH.

190a. The “règlement international des conflits des lois en matière de mariage et de divorce,” adopted by the Institute of International Law at Lausanne, runs thus, viz.:—

“I. De la loi qui régit la forme de la célébration du mariage.”

“Article premier. La loi qui régit la forme de la célébration du mariage est celle du pays où le mariage est célébré.”

In form at least this attributes a coercitive and not a permissive force to the rule “locus regit actum.” This mistake rendered it necessary, in the interest of freedom of conscience, to add several subsidiary articles; but even they will not satisfy the requirements of the case. If it had simply been provided that, “in so far as matters of form are concerned, the validity of a marriage ceremony is sufficiently secured if the forms of the place where it is celebrated are observed,” then article 2 and the first half of article 3 might have been dispensed with.

“Art. 2. Seront toute fois reconnus partout comme valables quant à la forme:—”

“1st. Les mariages célébrés en pays non-chrétiens conformément aux capitulations en vigueur.”

“2nd. Les mariages diplomatiques ou consulaires célébrés dans les formes prescrites par la loi du pays de qui relève la légation ou le consulat, si les deux parties contractantes appartiennent à ce pays.”

“Art. 3. Si dans un pays la forme de la célébration est purement religieuse, les étrangers doivent être autorisés à célébrer leur mariage selon les formes

(Noireterre, 1881, J. viii. p. 529); and that, in order to ascertain whether a husband has, in settling provisions on his wife, exceeded the one-fourth part of his estate, which is the limit of this provision by French law, no account can be taken of real estate abroad (Leroy de Chaumont, 1879, J. vi. p. 549).]

The distinction as regards the different kinds of impediments in the way of marriage, which lies at the foundation of these proposals, is not, strictly speaking, sound. In the case of a marriage which two foreigners propose to celebrate, we can only justify the observance of the law of the place of the ceremony as to forbidden degrees of affinity or consanguinity in so far as the consummation of such an union is by that law a criminal offence. It is no matter of concern to our State whether two foreign spouses, who are only temporarily present in this country, are or are not nearly related to each other. On the other hand, the power of dispensation, which by article 6th is given to the officials of the State in which the marriage ceremony takes place, goes too far, if it is expected that the State to which the spouses belong will respect that dispensation, if it should be given. If, however, all that is meant is that the officials of the State, in which the marriage is celebrated, may be authorised to proceed with the marriage, then there is no reason for restricting the powers of dispensation to the cases which are mentioned, if it should happen that the lex loci actus recognises dispensations in other cases. Lastly, the distinction which is taken in article 9th between different kinds of impediments to marriage, with reference to the process of annulling a marriage, cannot be approved. If there is any distinction to be made at all, if it is not simply to be said that any offence against the personal law of the wife in the same way as any offence against that of the husband shall constitute a ground for annulling the marriage, then we should refuse to give effect to the plea of near kinship as a ground of nullity, supposing that that plea were founded on the law of the wife alone, and were not to be found in the law of the husband; on the other hand, again, we should in such a case recognise that a failure to obtain the consent of parents and guardians must have an international effect. The question in this latter case is truly one which involves the protection of a woman who is minor, or is in a dependent position in a family. To say that this protection is ipso facto to be lost, from the fact that the wife has actually followed the husband into his country, or has by force or by craft been carried there by the husband, may fit in with the prehistoric idea of marriage by seizure, but will hardly fit in with the spirit of modern international law. The error of such a distinction becomes all the more prominent if we observe that, by some defective process of reasoning, the opposite result is reached in the case of the impediments to marriage arising from a defect of age, or from a failure to publish the banns, both of which stand in close connection with the requirement of parents' or guardians' consent, or at least may do so according to the positive provisions of some systems of law. The resolution on this point taken by the Institute runs directly in the teeth of the principles of the modern Franco-Italian school. There is room for debate whether the rules of private law have in themselves extra-territorial effect, with no other limit than the territorial jus publicum of some other State; but the directly contrary proposition here affirmed by the Institute is undoubtedly wrong:—

“Art. 11. Les droits et devoirs du mari envers la femme et de la femme envers le mari sont reconnus et protégés selon la loi nationale du mari, sauf les restrictions du droit public du lieu de la résidence des époux.

“Art. 12. Le régime des biens des époux embrasse tous les biens des époux, tant mobiliers qu'immobiliers, sauf les immeubles qui sont régis par une loi spéciale.

"Art. 13. Les contrats matrimoniaux relatifs aux biens des époux sont régis, quant à la forme, par la loi du lieu où ces contrats ont été conclus. Doivent toutefois être également considérés comme valables partout, les contrats matrimoniaux faits dans les formes exigées par la loi nationale des deux parties.

"Art. 14. A défaut d'un contrat de mariage, la loi du domicile matrimonial—c'est à dire du premier établissement des époux—régit les droits patrimoniaux des époux, s'il n'appert pas des circonstances ou des faits l'intention contraire des parties.

"Art. 15. Un changement du domicile ou de la nationalité des époux ou du mari n'a aucune influence sur le régime une fois établi entre les époux, sauf les droits des tiers.

"V. De la loi qui régit les effets de la nullité de mariage prononcée dans le pays de l'un des époux.

"Art. 16. Lorsqu'un mariage valable d'après la loi du pays de l'un des contractants aura été déclaré nul dans le pays de l'autre, le mariage devra être considéré comme nul partout, sauf les effets d'un mariage putatif.

"VI. De la loi qui régit le divorce.

"Art. 17. La question de savoir si un divorce est admissible ou non dépend de la législation nationale des époux.

"Art. 18. Si le divorce est admis en principe par la loi nationale, les causes qui le motivent doivent être celles de la loi du lieu où l'action est intentée. Le divorce ainsi prononcé par le tribunal compétent sera reconnu valable partout."

Of these articles, article 10, in the first place, is incorrect. Apart from the consideration that the rights of children cannot be disposed of as part of this subject, we cannot see why any person, who may, according to the personal law which he enjoys at any particular moment, legitimate a child, should be prevented from doing so by the operation of a personal law, which was no doubt regulative of the relations of the spouses at the time at which they were married, but has now no further operation upon their personal relations. See infra, § 192.

Another error has been committed in taking as the basis for the regulation of the matrimonial property the law of the matrimonial domicile, instead of the national law of the husband. This is wrong, both with reference to the resolutions passed at Oxford as to the effects of nationality on matters of private law, and also with reference to the concluding words of art. 13. If art. 14 is to stand, we must substitute "par la loi du domicile matrimoniale" for "par la loi nationale" in art. 13.

Art. 18, which I hold to be untenable, was presented in the same form in the Heidelberg resolutions of 1887. See supra, § 178.

II. RELATIONS OF PARENTS AND CHILDREN.

A. PERSONAL RELATIONS IN GENERAL.

§ 191. The purely personal relations of parents and children are, like the personal relations of the spouses, to be determined by their personal law, or the law of their nationality. Rights, however, which must be held by the law of any particular State to be immoral or contrary to the principles of the freedom of individuals, cannot be put in force within that State. The result is that a father or mother has no more right of correction than is warranted by the law of their own home, and no more than the law of the place, in which it is proposed to exercise that right, permits.¹ A French father has the right given to him by the Code Civil (art. 376, 377) to have, in certain circumstances, his minor son, who is not forisfamiliated, detained in a house of correction, but he does not enjoy any such right in a country which does not ascribe any such extensive scope for the father's powers. But a foreign father has just as little claim to exercise this right in France, if his own domestic law does not invest him with it. If this foreign law does not assign to the family relation, in order to insure due respect being paid to the father, so extensive a power as this, the law of France has no reason for doing so. Public order is sufficiently protected by means of the public criminal law, which also lays obligations upon children.² The mother, too, upon the father's death, assumes rights of a similar kind, in so far only as the domestic law of the marriage allows her to do so. It is plain that, by the acquisition of another nationality, the rights of the parents may be altered.³ The same rules apply to the right of the father, or the mother, as the case may be, to settle the religious training of the children.⁴ But if by the operation of some particular legal

² To the same effect Fiore, §§ 161, 162 ; Brocher, § 105 ; Asser-Rivier, § 56 ad fin. ; and particularly Weiss, p. 746. It is, however, being more and more recognised in France, that the patria potestas is not a droit civil to the effect that foreigners are debarred from it in France. Cf. C. de Paris, 2nd August 1874 (J. i. p. 32), and Weiss, p. 749, note 1.

⁴ Where, however, there is doubt, any permanent arrangement, which has been arrived at in accordance with the law of the earlier domicile, must continue to be respected in the new domicile, even although the law of the new domicile should pronounce contracts, as to the religion in which children are to be educated, to be null. Again, in case of doubt, we must hold that the provisions of the law of the place of residence, as to the religious upbringing of children, have no application to the children of foreigners, and in competition with the national law of foreigners, have no compulsory force. To this effect is the interesting decision of the Austrian Minister of Education, of 31st March 1881, reported in J. viii. p. 236. The question was whether a Prussian subject domiciled in Austria could exercise the right, which by Prussian law he had, of settling the form of his children's religious education. The Austrian minister rightly decided that the Austrian law could do nothing more than determine the proper form for the declaration of the father.

fact, such as a decree of divorce, the mother has acquired special rights in reference to the upbringing of the children, these will not be touched by a subsequent change of nationality on the part of the father: it may be that they will require to be made good in the new forum which the father has acquired. (To this effect a judgment of the Supreme Court of Vienna, of 2nd June 1881; Seuffert, xxxviii. § 1, a judgment which in this way recognised the consequences of divorce according to the law of Bavaria; so, too, judgments of the Supreme Court of Bavaria, of 16th December 1876, and of the Supreme Court at Celle, of 5th October 1877; Seuffert, xxxii. § 203, xxxiii. § 97.)

If the child has a different nationality from that of his father, the latter has no more extensive rights than are allowed him by the law of the child's nationality; e.g. if the consent of the father is not needed for the betrothal or marriage of the child, it is of no consequence that the father may by his own personal law refuse to give such consent, and by doing so stop the betrothal or marriage.⁵

NOTE M ON § 191. PERSONAL RELATIONS OF PARENT AND CHILD.

[In England the extent of the authority of a foreign parent over his child is the same as that of an English parent (Westlake, p. 48). Boyle, L. J. C., in Edmonstone v. Edmonstone, 1st June 1816, Fac. Coll. gives an opinion which, read literally, implies that Scots law is the same. His lordship refuses to admit that persons coming into the territory of a foreign State can insist on having effect given to the peculiarities of their own law. But the fair interpretation of the passage seems to be that placed on it by Lord Fraser (Parent and Child, p. 590), which assimilates the law of Scotland very much to that of the text, recognising the foreign law, except in so far as it offends our sense of propriety, order, or decency.

On the other hand, it has been held by the French courts that they will, in the interests of morality, accord to a foreigner, who is merely resident in France, the powers conferred by the patria potestas upon Frenchmen; and although without the authorisation of Government he does not enjoy civil rights, he will yet be entitled to appeal to the courts to ordain a child of nineteen years to return to him (Trib. Civ. de la Seine, 3rd February 1872). This decision seems to be rather in the direction of the English principle, than in that laid down in the text, and adopted by Lord Fraser, for it does not appear that in this case the father would, by the law of his own country, have had any such rights. The distinction between the notion of domicile with us, and of nationality in French law, as conferring a right of access to legal remedies, must, however, be kept in view. The father's residence may have had all the permanency of what we call domicile.]

B. PATERNAL AUTHORITY.

1. CONSTITUTION OF THIS AUTHORITY BY BIRTH OR LEGITIMATION.

§ 192. The personal law which attached to the father of a child at the time of the child's birth must decide all questions as to whether the child was born in wedlock, and therefore became subject to his father's authority.¹ The place of the marriage in particular may be set out of account.²

The same law will determine the effect of the special presumptions with regard to paternity (the French action en desaveu, cf. Code Civ. 312 et seq.): these are not rules for convincing the judge, which would be subject to the lex fori,³ but substantial rights of the child;⁴ as a French author has said, we have here to consider the step by which they enter the families that make up the nation. We shall give our reasons for this view in discussing the law of process; at present we need only point out how dangerous it would be if the child were prevented from founding on the presumptions that established his legitimacy at the time of his birth, or if different judgments as to his legitimacy could be given in different countries.

If a particular form is necessary for the recognition of a bastard child, we must apply the maxim "locus regit actum," if we are satisfied of the existence of an intention to recognise the child, an intention which in certain circumstances—the act of recognition being essentially an act which falls under the personal law of him who makes it—may be open to doubt.⁵

² Cf. Trib. Lesparre, and C. de Bourdeaux, 27th August 1877 (J. v. p. 39), and Clunet (J. v. p. 40). Thus the children of a Frenchman may be legitimated by his marriage, which has taken place in England.

³ Burge, i. p. 88, is of another mind.

⁴ See infra the law of process as to the presumptions which come in for particular legal relations. Bouhier and Fœlix; Asser-Rivier, § 56, note 1; Duguit, J. xii. p. 353; Savigny, § 380; Guthrie, p. 301; Unger, p. 195; Stobbe, § 34, note 30; Fiore, § 136; Brocher, Rev. v. p. 57; Laurent, v. § 242, take the same view as that stated in the text. Even Burge recognises that the so-called presumptiones juris et de jure, such as the 314th article of the Code Civil establishes in favour of legitimacy, against which no counter-proof, however strong it may be, is admissible, are not mere regulations for the persuasion of the judge. The rules as to possession d'état are part of the same subject. If the disposal of an inheritance depends on the birth of a child in wedlock, and if the legitimacy must be questioned within a certain period, it is the personal law of the father which must regulate all such questions. See Fiore ut cit.; Savigny (§ 377. Guthrie, p. 284) is wrong.

Legitimation of bastards, either by subsequent marriage or by an Act of the Government (Rescriptum principis), is nothing but a legal equalisation of certain children, illegitimately begotten, with legitimate children. The law which rules the rights of legitimate children must therefore regulate the legitimation of bastards; and as the former are subject to the actual personal law of the father, the latter must be determined⁶ also by the personal law of the father at the date when the fact said to infer legitimation took place. If, then, there is a question of legitimation per subsequens matrimonium, the child is legitimate, if that is the result of the personal law which the father enjoyed at the time of the marriage. This is now the prevailing view.⁷

The result, to take an illustration, is that, if the father at the time of the marriage is a Frenchman, and the child up to that time has not been recognised, the 331st article of the Code Civil prevents him from subsequently legitimating the child unless, be it remarked, he subsequently again changes his nationality, and the personal law so subsequently acquired by him gives effect to a subsequent act of recognition.

DECISIVE DATE.

§ 193. Some authorities have laid down that the time of the birth shall alone rule such questions, because by its birth the child acquires⁸ the character which is to determine whether it can be legitimated, and if so, in what way; or, as has been well said, because by the birth of the child there but no such restriction is to be presumed from the fact that the personal law requires public intimation of any recognition which is to take place in its own country. See Fiore, § 139, to the opposite effect, who, however, properly points out that "non-authentic" documents or actes are of course much exposed to dispute, and do not, by virtue of the rule "locus regit actum," take rank in all respects with "authentic" documents or actes. Cf. Clunet, J. iv. p. 234, and C. de Besancon, 29th July 1876, J. iv. p. 228.

⁶ It is of no moment in what place the subsequent marriage of the parents took place. See Wheaton, § 93, p. 123, and the authorities cited infra. Stobbe ut cit.

is established a legal relation between it and its father, which must be governed alone by the law under which it originated.⁹ But although the birth of a bastard may lay certain obligations upon him who has had connection with the mother before the birth, and to a certain extent therefore a legal relation is established by the birth between the child and the putative father; yet the very meaning of an illegitimate birth is that a family relation, which is all we are now concerned with, certainly does not arise between them. Nothing can be inferred from the purely arbitrary expression "capacity or incapacity of the child to be legitimated;" it might as reasonably be maintained that if the law of the place where the child was born forbade marriages between cousins, and thus pronounced a child incapable of such a marriage, this child could not, in consequence of his original incapacity, contract a marriage in that degree after he had acquired a new domicile, the law of which was ignorant of the prohibition. Nor can it be urged that according to our view the father may, before entering on his marriage with the mother, choose a personal law prejudicial to the interests of the child. For on the one hand the legitimation of a child depends upon a voluntary recognition by the father,¹⁰ and, on the other, if a recognition of the child made under a prior personal law really confers a right upon it conditional upon the subsequent marriage, then this right is not lost by a change of the personal law.¹¹ Although the new personal law does not invest the recognition which has taken place within its bounds with the force of legitimation, it will certainly not deny to a recognition made within the territory of another law the effect which that law attached to it.

WHERE THE FATHER AND THE CHILD ARE SUBJECT TO DIFFERENT PERSONAL LAWS.

§ 194. The question may, however, be raised: If the father and the child belong to different States with distinct legal systems, is it sufficient that there should be legitimation by the law under which the father lives, or must it also conform to the law of the child?¹²

⁹ Schäffner, pp. 50, 51.

¹⁰ Savigny, § 380; Guthrie, p. 302.

These questions have recently been thoroughly discussed by Duguit¹³ and Weiss (p. 733).¹⁴ Duguit pronounces in favour of the exclusive competency of the personal law of the father, while Weiss takes the opposite view. Duguit's opinion is that the law which is recognised as applicable to the head of the family, in matters concerned with family law, must also furnish the rule for all the members of that family. In any other view we should be landed in this illogical position, that the legitimization would be effectual as regarded the father, but ineffectual as regarded the child. If, however, the question raised is a question as to the validity of an act of legitimization, the first point for determination is whether the child is a member of the family or not. The bond between father and child must be made fast at both ends, just as in marriage the bond between husband and wife must hold on both sides, before the personal law of the wife can be made to follow that of the husband. On principle, therefore, the opposite of Duguit's view is the sound view.¹⁵

But, in reaching a practical solution of the question, we must consider the following matters. If the personal law of the child requires more conditions to be observed before it will pronounce that a child has been legitimated, the reason of that is not any anxiety for the interest of the child so much as for that of the father and his family, e.g. the other children, his collateral relations. But the State to which the child has up to that moment belonged has no interest in that matter, and if that legal system which is charged with the protection of the family is willing to hold the child legitimated, there is in truth no conflict between the two systems. That system to which the child has hitherto belonged says: "If the father belonged to me, I would not hold the child to be legitimated." That involves no contradiction of the other system, which says: "Since the father belongs to me, I do hold the child to be legitimated." No doubt we must assume that the assent of the child is given in due legal form, for legitimization can only take place against the child's wish, if the personal law of the child forces that upon him or her.¹⁶ But, in by far the greater number of cases, it will be beyond all doubt that the legitimization is advantageous to the child, and the child, or its guardian, can subsequently signify its approval of it and found upon it. Thus in practice the personal law of the father is in the general case the only law which is invoked.

What, however, are we to say if the personal law of the child in the case in question absolutely forbids legitimization as contra bonos mores, whereas the personal law of the father permits it? If, for instance, the latter permits while the former forbids the legitimization of an adulterinus? Fiore, § 137, takes the view that, as we are here concerned with a principle of public order or police, the legitimization can have no operation in ¹³ J. xiii. pp. 515, 516.

¹⁴ In the same way, v. Martens, § 74.

¹⁵ See Gand, § 46, and Brocher, Nouv. Tr. § 44, p. 154.

¹⁶ It is different with the rights of the mother; for in that case it is possible to have a convincing proof of the relationship. Cf. Gand, § 458, any country which does not admit it in the particular circumstances of the case. Weiss must, of course, reach the same result, as he requires in all cases a concurrence of these two legal systems. But if we examine the matter closely, we find that all the rules as to legitimation rest upon considerations of public order, upon "boni mores," but that the point is that different legal systems have different ideas as to what public order, "boni mores," is. This argument will therefore prove everything, and therefore nothing.¹⁷ It is, however, of the highest importance, that the laws which prohibit such legitimation, e.g. the laws of France and Italy, regard it as unseemly that a family connection between the adulterinus and his father should be publicly recognised. If, however, the adulterinus by means of this legitimation enters a family which belongs permanently to a foreign country, what possible interest can the other legal system have in hindering the formation of the family tie? Just as much interest as it would have had in refusing to recognise the legitimation if both persons had from the first belonged to the other State, i.e. no interest at all. The prohibition, the object of which is not so much to put the innocent child at a disadvantage as to protect the purity of families which have a permanent connection with the State, has no meaning in so far as families are concerned, which have no such permanent connection.¹⁸

PRIVILEGES OF RANK.

§ 195. Peculiar difficulties are presented by the case where the original personal law of the father refuses to recognise the subsequent marriage which he has contracted under the sway of another personal law (by being naturalised in another State), as a ground for legitimation, and questions thereafter arise as to some special privileges of rank in the former country. In a case of that kind the civil tribunal of the Seine, of 30th May 1879, recognised that the legitimation in itself must be ruled by the national law of the father at the date at which it took place, but that in

¹⁷ By such considerations it might be sought to show that, if the law of the place of the marriage necessarily associates legitimation with marriage, the children even of foreigners would have to be recognised as legitimated in the country where the marriage took place, even although the personal law of the father knew no such rule. This is a palpable error. It has, however, found some favour in French jurisprudence by virtue of the magic sound of the words, "ordre public," which will justify anything. See C. de Rouen, 5th January 1887, affirming the judgment of the court of first instance (J. xiv. p. 183) and on this disputed question generally, Duguit (J. xiii. p. 513).

¹⁸ Fiore, § 137, is of another opinion. On the other hand, the law of the Argentine Republic says, so far soundly (Daireaux, J. xiii. p. 297), on this point: "La reconnaissance des enfants adultérins, incestueux ou sacrilèges (e.g. children begotten by priests) étant prohibée par disposition d'ordre public, elle ne pourra être demandée ni exécutée dans les limites du territoire, quand bien même la loi du domicile des parents au moment de la naissance ne s'y opposait pas; mais celle pratiquée hors du territoire produira tous ses effets dans la République si elle était permise dans le pays où elle a été exécutée." such a case the legitimation could not confer titles of nobility belonging to the father in virtue of a personal law which he had previously enjoyed.¹⁹ This decision is wrong, if we assume that the father's noble rank was recognised when he took his new nationality; for in that case his rank passed to his child in conformity with the new personal law, and persons who belonged to the family of the father, in particular his collateral relatives, had no right to forbid the child to bear his name, title, and arms,²⁰ even in the State to which they themselves belonged, and to which the father once belonged. It is quite sound, however, to say this much, that the child cannot make good his relationship to those other members of the family; for the law of the country to which the family belongs can deny this effect to the act of legitimation.²¹

IS THE PERSONAL LAW OF THE MOTHER TO BE CONSIDERED?

§ 196. The application of the personal law of the father to the question of legitimation may, especially if the law of the domicile be held to be the personal law, lead to the mother being deceived, or put difficulties in the way of the subsequent marriage. Considerations of this kind prompted a judgment of the French Court of Cassation, of 23rd November 1857, which has been much canvassed. It recognised, on the ground of French legal principles, an act of legitimation in a case in which a foreigner, an Englishman, married a French woman: "Attendu que la législation et la jurisprudence anglaises . . . ne pourraient au cas, où le père seul est Anglais et domicilié en France, la mère et les enfants nés en France, enlever à cette femme le droit qu'elle tenait de la loi Française, qui était la loi du domicile matrimonial à laquelle les futurs époux sont réputés avoir eu la volonté de se soumettre . . ."²² But the law of the family cannot be made to depend in this fashion on the expectations of the parties. To do so would be to place it on a level with ordinary contract law, without being able to found upon the very consideration which is the determinant in ordinary contract law. For each party will certainly, if he or she is wise, inform him or herself in the case of a marriage contract, if ever, as to the personal law of the party with whom he or she is about to contract. Besides, the result of such conclusions, drawn as they are from the supposed interest of subjects of

²⁰ Cf. what was said supra, § 98 (p. 216), on the law of names.

²² Of course, we find in this case also an appeal to "ordre public" as an ultimum refugium.

the country, and dependent exclusively on the theories of domestic law, is to set up at once different modes of treating the relation in different countries. In the father's country, in the case just mentioned, the children would be regarded as illegitimate, whereas their mother's country treats them as legitimate.

We should, however, be just as little inclined—although Duguit is of another opinion—to make an exception in the case of naturalisation being obtained in fraudem legis, i.e. in the case where a man gets himself naturalised in another State, in order to bring about in that other State the legitimation which is not permissible in his own. This exception breaks down in the same way as the theory of naturalisation being invalid because effected in fraudem legis, which we have already tried to refute. As Duguit himself owns, the proof of the conduct of the person being in fraudem legis is difficult enough, while uncertainty as to the status of the family, and challenges of it, bring unhappiness and ruin upon the family, without any advantage to the State.

EFFECT OF LEGITIMATION ON SUCCESSION. THEORY OF ENGLISH LAW.

§ 197. The effect of legitimation, in accordance with the law of the domicile, must extend to questions of succession to immoveables situated abroad,²³ in so far as these depend upon the recognition of the child as legitimate.²⁴ The judgments of the English courts²⁵ differ from this, and require, in order to found a claim to succession in immoveables, that the child should be held legitimate by the law of the place where the estate lies, and that in spite of the fact that they have approved of the view whereby a child, illegitimate by the law of its domicile, is held incapable of making any claim of succession to immoveables, whatever the law of the place where these are situated may be.²⁶ These judgments may be explained in this manner: The exclusion of children begotten out of wedlock,²⁷ who have been recognised by the father, depended, in earlier

²³ Schäffner, p. 53; Bouhier, chap. 24, No. 123; Gunther, p. 732; Hommel, Rhaps. Quæst. ii. obs. 409, No. 3; Hert, iv. 14; Boullenois, i. pp. 62, 63, 130, 131.

²⁵ Burge, i. p. 109, approves of these judgments: "The personal quality or status of the person, if it constitutes his title to succeed to real property, must be that which the lex loci vel rei sitæ has prescribed." Wharton, §§ 242, 243; Westlake Holtzendorff, §§ 168, 168a; see too, Foote, p. 39.

²⁶ Story, 87a.

English law, not only upon the legal uncertainty as to their birth—which can only be removed by legitimation, as is the case in modern Roman law—but upon an incomplete incapacity attributed to bastards,²⁸ such as we often find in older German law and in many feudal systems. Now, since a foreigner has no greater or more complete capacity than an Englishman, he is not entitled to acquire landed property in England, where feudal principles regulate all questions of title to land, any more than he would be entitled in his own country, supposing the same principles of feudal law to prevail there, to claim succession to feu rights, even although he had obtained a grant of legitimacy from the Crown, which would apply to all other legal relations.²⁹ The fact that one who is pronounced incapable by his own lex domicilii cannot succeed ab intestato to land in England,³⁰ whatever the law of England might say as to his capacity, is explained by observing that in such a case the lex domicilii denies the relationship of the deceased to the successor, and that relationship must be determined by the lex domicilii, and constitutes by the law of England a necessary condition of a claim of succession in immoveables.

If, as is probable, the remnants of feudal principles shall still more pass out of memory in England, a time will come when, even in questions of succession to real estate in England, an act of legitimation, valid in accordance with the personal law, will receive full effect.

NOTE N ON §§ 192-197. LEGITIMATION.

[The law of Scotland holds that the domicile of the father at the time of the marriage is the important consideration in determining the legal effect of that marriage upon the status of the children of the persons married (Fraser, Parent and Child, p. 52, and cases quoted there). The case of a birth taking place while the domicile of the putative father was in a country whose law forbade legitimation per subsequens matrimonium, while his marriage with the mother took place at a time when his domicile was in a country whose law allowed such legitimation, has not yet occurred in ²⁸ The exception which the law of England makes in the case of a bastard puis né can only be referred to equitable principles.

²⁹ See supra, § 137, principles of legal capacity. The grounds assigned in England for this decision do not justify it, as Lord Brougham has shown. In particular, the words of the statute of Merton, which have to be considered, by which there is required birth "in lawful wedlock," merely require legitimacy generally; nor can we allow an appeal to the fact that we have to deal with a prohibitive statute, since, as is well known, there are prohibitive statutes which, without any dispute, are counted as personal statutes. Molinæus, ad Consult. Paris, § 8, gl. 1, Nos. 36-46, gives a decision similar to the English decision, and Bouhier, chap. 24, No. 123, also, in the case of a statute calling only children "nés en loyal mariage" to the succession. Westlake gives the same explanation. So long ago as 1840, Lord Brougham took a different view in the well-known case of Birtwhistle v. Vardill [7 Cl. and Fin. 940], decided by the House of Lords against his views. Westlake says that we have here to deal with no rule of international law, but with a rule of feudal law. The law of Scotland differs from that of England.

³⁰ Phillimore, § 539.

Scottish law; the domicile at the date of the birth has never been in conflict with that at the date of the marriage, but the judges in Monro's case, 1840, 7 Cl. and Fin. p. 842, all held the view that if such a case should occur, the law of the domicile at the date of the marriage must rule. Lord Brougham, in giving judgment in that case in the House of Lords, and enunciating principles applicable in England as well as in Scotland, says: "If the domicile were not the same for both parents at these two periods, we should hold that that of the father at the time of the marriage should give the rule."

Lord Hatherley, however, in a subsequent case (Udny v. Udny, 1869, L. R. 1, S. and D. A. 447) makes the law of the country in which the father is domiciled at the date of the birth give the rule: his lordship bases this opinion upon the view attacked by the author—viz. the capacity for legitimation attaching to the child at that date.

As regards succession to real estate, the law of England is correctly stated in the text; that of Scotland will allow one legitimate by the law of his domicile, unless that character be derived from a union considered incestuous by Scots law, to inherit real estate in Scotland.

The French courts have held that the place of the marriage matters not, and that an English marriage will be sufficient to legitimate the children of a French father and an English mother (Courbin v. Verrières, C. de Bourdeaux, 1877, J. v. p. 39). On the question as to the form of legitimation—i.e. whether there must, previously to the marriage, be a recognition in the French form of the paternity of the children, or a formal recognition of some kind—the French courts have differed; the Court of Besancon on Appeal (Balmiger v. Dutailly, 1876, J. iv. p. 228) determined that in the case of children born of French parents in California, where the marriage afterwards took place, no previous recognition was required, the fact of the children having lived in family with their parents being sufficient evidence of paternity, which is the object of requiring a formal recognition; the question of the status of the children was held to be a personal law, and need not, therefore, be referred to the determination of the law of the country in which they were claiming succession; such children were therefore held entitled to succeed to estate, real and personal, belonging to a succession that had opened in France, and was therefore being administered according to French law. The Court of Paris, on the other hand, held (Chevillon v. Héritiers Méchain, 1876, J. iv. 230) that bastards, if legitimated abroad, could only be legitimated according to French law, and that the fact of their being children of their reputed father could only be proved in the way directed by French law—viz. by a declaration previous to the marriage, no equivalents being sufficient. The peculiarity of the French rule of evidence as to the paternity of a child, which does not permit that relation to be established, save by the confession of the father, leads to these difficulties, and it is on the ground that any infraction of this rule would be contra bonos mores that the decision of the Court of Paris proceeds. Again, the French courts have held (Joly v. Perkins, 1887, J. xiv. p. 183) that, legitimation being a matter of public order, it may result from a marriage which has taken place in France, the husband being by nationality an Englishman, and that this result will ensue all the more readily, if the wife is a Frenchwoman.]

Legitimatio per Rescriptum IN PARTICULAR.

§ 198. In what we have said, we have proceeded on the footing that legitimation, if the consent of the child be validly given, is dependent solely on the personal law of the father, and that, therefore, if this law allows legitimation by an act of the head of the State, it matters not to enquire whether some other legal system, in particular the personal law which the child has hitherto enjoyed, also recognises this legitimation; but that on the contrary legitimation per rescriptum is to be regarded in international law on exactly the same footing as legitimation per subsequens matrimonium. This opinion, which as we think is the prevailing opinion in German jurisprudence, and in which, too, Fiore, § 149; Phillimore, § 542; and Wharton, § 249, concur, has, however, often been disputed.

In the first place, it has been said that an act of that kind by a sovereign, or possibly by a sovereign corporation, must necessarily have its operation confined to the dominions of that sovereign, for he has no authority beyond these limits. But if it be true generally that the personal law of the father is to rule, that law must be allowed to say that legitimation can take place by means of an act of that kind. The legitimation is to be recognised, not because the sovereign is to exercise sovereign rights in another country, but because the personal law is to have effect there.³¹ The opposite opinion, which is held by older writers,³² is no doubt explained, and to some extent justified, by the imperfect legal capacity which, in the Middle Ages, and in many territories down to later times, clung to the bastard,³³ especially, too, as the sole result of legitimation, even in the territory of the sovereign who bestowed it, was in many cases merely to withdraw the estate of the person so legitimated, upon his death, from the ³¹ So, in particular, Foote ut cit. Gianzana, i. § 101, takes the opposite side in rather a peculiar way.

³³ Alb. Brun. de statut. art. xiii. § 51. "Et ideo differt legitimatus a legitimo tanquam imago ab eo cujus imaginem representat. Et propterea Salycetus dixit quod legitimatio non facit esse essentialiter legitimam." Bald Ubald in L. 1, C. de S. Trin. No. 75; Chassenæus in Consuet. Burgund. Rubr. ix. in tit. des mains mortes. verb. va demeurer, Nos. 17, 18; P. Voet, iv. 3, § 15; Argentæus, No. 20; J. Voet, de stat. § 7; Bartol. ad L. 1, C. de S. Trin. Alef. No. 59; Cocceji, de fund. v. §§ 7, 8; Boullenois, i. p. 64; cf. Bouhier, chap. 24, No. 129.

grasp of his sovereign, and to leave it to the relatives of the person legitimated, by suspending the old German rule of law, which forbade bastards either to succeed or, to a certain extent, to leave a succession.³⁴ In view of the import which attaches to legitimation, when, as in modern times,³⁵ in most territorial systems, illegitimacy no longer works any diminution of legal capacity, while legitimacy merely gives the concrete rights which depend on relationship, it cannot be represented, in discussing the effect of legitimation per rescriptum on the right of succession to foreign heritable property, that the sovereign is dealing with estate which lies beyond his territory: ³⁶ as we hold a foreigner to be a bastard, if he is so by the law of his domicile, we must also hold him to be legitimate if the law of his domicile declares him to be so.³⁷ On the other hand, legitimation given in a country of which the father is not a subject, does not bestow any rights of relationship as against him.³⁸

But, in the second place, the more modern French school, while they reject the view of the older writers³⁹ as to the effect of the legitimation being necessarily confined to the territory of the sovereign who bestows it, refuse to recognise this kind of legitimation, unless it is also recognised in the personal law which the child has hitherto enjoyed. In this way one who has hitherto been a French child in respect that the Code Civil has never sanctioned legitimation per rescriptum, can never be legitimated by the act of a foreign sovereign. But Laurent, in arguing in support of this doctrine that legitimation touches the status of persons, and that this status must be determined everywhere for Frenchmen by the law of France, proves too much. This rule would have to hold also in the case of legitimation by subsequent marriage, so that, in this case also, the personal law of the child would be the only rule. Of course, in determining the question of legitimation, we decide, but not absolutely, the question whether the child thereby changes its nationality.⁴⁰

³⁵ Except in feudal law. See Gerber, § 110.

³⁶ Several of the authors cited in note 34 take this ground.

³⁷ Schäffner, p. 55; Wening Ingenheim, § 22; Mühlenbruch, § 72; Gunther, p. 732; Hommel, Rhaps. Quæst. ii. obs. 409, No. 3, Supreme Court of Appeal at Kiel, 2nd February 1853 (Seuffert, 7, p. 399). "The legal effect of legitimation bestowed by a foreign sovereign extends to estate of a deceased person situated abroad." One who by a rescriptum principis is legitimated in his own domicile must, therefore, be held to be legitimate in France, although the Code Civil does not recognise emancipation per rescriptum (cf. Code Civil, arts. 331-333; Zacharia, Civilrecht, iii. § 370).

³⁸ Judgment of the Cour d'Appel of Paris, 11th February 1808 (Sirey, 8, 2, p. 86). Such a legitimation no doubt confers complete legal capacity for all legal relations pertaining to the territory of the sovereign conferring it, if the bastard has an incomplete capacity there.

³⁹ So Laurent, v. § 294. Weiss, pp. 734, 735.

⁴⁰ Foote, pp. 44, 45, discusses another limitation which is to be placed on the effect of legitimation, viz.: that the legitimation must not involve anything which is absolutely at variance with the law of the country in which it is proposed that it shall receive effect; and he founds, in support of this limitation, particularly on a judgment of Lord Brougham [in Fenton v. Livingstone, 1859, 3 Macq. 497]. If, for instance, the lex domicilii sanctions the marriage

2. ADOPTION AND ARROGATION. EMANCIPATION.

§ 199. The constitution of the paternal authority by adoption or arrogation must be subject to the same rules which apply to its constitution by legitimation. The only difference between the two modes of constituting the paternal authority is that in the case of legitimation there is a natural relation between the parties, which is the occasion of it, and which dictates the form of it, whereas in adoption and arrogation the only originating element is the will of the parties. The important matter in adoption and arrogation for international law is the object which they are intended to effect, i.e. the entry of the adopted or arrogated person into the family of the person who adopts.

As a matter of principle, then, both systems of law, viz. the personal law of the adoptive father, and that of the adopted child, must permit adoption.¹ The conditions with which the adoption is hedged, are provided for this reason only, that the family of the adoptive father may be protected against the intrusion, more or less arbitrary, of foreign elements, or that adoption or arrogation may not prevent legitimation by subsequent marriage. Such conditions, from their nature, only fall to be considered if they exist in the personal law of the person who makes the adoption. The legal system and the State to which the child belongs have no concern with the constitution of the family of the adoptive father. Its only care is the welfare of the child, and thus none of the restrictive conditions which exist in the law of the child need be considered,² except those which are intended to protect the person adopted from a hasty and disadvantageous adoption or arrogation.³ If we are asked to consider in particular those restrictive conditions, which are set up in the real or supposed interest of public morality, none of these can be regarded, except such as exist in the country of the adoptive father. As a general rule, therefore, the conditions of the personal law of the adoptive father will come more into practical effect than those of that of the child.⁴ If into which the parents of the person legitimated have entered, while the lex rei sitæ holds it to be a crime, the legitimated child cannot inherit ab intestato under the lex rei sitæ. But this is an offence against the leading principle of international law stated in § 36. What is said to be a criminal relation does not work itself out within the territory where the estate is situated. The decision is simply an echo of the theory which holds that all, even the most remote conditions of a real right, can only be determined by the lex rei sitæ.

² The result is substantially the same if, with Vesque v. Püttlingen, p. 255; Fiore, § 152; Laurent, vi. § 31; Brocher, i. § 101; Nouv. Tr. § 46; Weiss, p. 739, we allow the personal law of the adoptive father to determine his capacity, and the personal law of the child to determine his.

³ E.g. the rule of the Code Civil, art. 346: "L'adoption ne pourra en aucun cas, avoir lieu avant la majorité de l'adopté."

⁴ In my first edition I fell into error, in proceeding too exclusively upon the personal law of the adoptive father. Unger, p. 195, and Stobbe, § 31, vii. still follow this theory. Schmid has on this subject also a peculiar doctrine. According to him, the legal results of adoption

English law knows no adoption in the sense of the law of Rome or of France, or if the law of Rome and the law of Italy exclude the adoption of a natural child, a thing which is sanctioned by other systems, the adoption of a child of English nationality is, for all that, possible by a Prussian who has his domicile in the province of Hannover, or by a Frenchman: and in the same way a Saxon subject⁵ may adopt a natural child who has been French by nationality.⁶ There is, however, no doubt that in such a case the adoptive father could not make good any rights against the child, for these rights could only be acquired under the personal law of the child.⁷ On the other hand, it is in our view unsound to attribute any effect at all, in any State you like, to an adoption which is invalid by the personal law of the adoptive father, and that even although the rule of law, which forbids adoption in the country of the adoptive father, is directly in contradiction of all the legal theories on which the system of the other State which is in question rests. Thus, for instance, adoption by a monk, who is by his own personal law incapable of adopting, has no effect even in such a country as France, where the status of members of religious orders is ignored to all civil effects. The same rule holds, e.g. in a case where adoption by a person of noble rank is forbidden unless with the sanction of the sovereign, and the necessity of obtaining this has been overlooked, even although in the country to which the adoptive son belongs, all special rights of nobility have, as a matter of principle, been swept away.⁸ How can it be asserted that a child has been admitted into the family of the adoptive father, if the law which directly regulates this family rejects the person who is alleged to have so entered it?

The rule "locus regit actum"⁹ determines the form of the adoption. The personal law which is in itself applicable, may, however, expressly or by implication, exclude the application of any foreign forms. Again, if the law requires the approval of some court or some official to be obtained, and if it is competent for the court or official to refuse to approve, this is not a form¹⁰ in the sense of the rule "locus regit actum." Approval of this must always be settled by the judge according to his own law, and thus if it does not permit adoption, all legal effect will be denied to an adoption validly carried out in a foreign country in which the adoptive father was at that time domiciled.

⁵ Bürgerl. Gesetz. für das Königr. Sachsen. § 1790.

⁶ Weiss, p. 740, is of a different opinion.

⁷ The result would be a sort of one-sided adoption.

⁸ Weiss, p. 740. The theory of Ordre Public International is a bad guide here.

⁹ Bouhier, cap. 24, § 86; Boullenois, ii. pp. 48, 49; Merlin, Rép. Puissance Paternelle, vii. §§ 5-7; Hert, iv. 47; Hofeaker, De off. § 21; Unger, p. 195; Weiss, p. 740.

kind can only be given by the officials of the State to which the person belongs,¹¹ and it will often be necessary to have a double approval, one in the State of the adoptive father, and a second in the State of the child that is to be adopted.

If the child does not, in virtue of the adoption, acquire the nationality¹² of the adoptive father, then the rights of the child as against the father adopting him must be ruled by the personal law of the father, the rights of the father as against the child by the child's personal law. A different view proposes that the law of the adoptive father shall be the exclusive rule, while yet another theory takes that of the child as the exclusive rule. But, although it is true that in a question of adoption it is the rights of the child as against the adoptive father that come far most frequently into view, and that the law, even in France, refers the parties, in so far as the execution of the act of adoption is concerned, to the judge of the adoptive father's domicile,¹³ it does not follow from this being the general course of matters that the personal law of the adoptive father is the only law applicable. In opposition to the argument that adoption operates a change in the status of the child,¹⁴ we may refer to the fact that the child enters the family of his adoptive father.

But both theories come into conflict with the leading principles of the law of succession. Now, adoption is a matter of special importance in the law of succession, and the course of succession to the adoptive father must be in accordance with his personal law, while succession to the child must be regulated by his personal law. With these rules the theory which we have adopted is in complete accord. What rights the child has against his original family, and what rights they continue to have against him after the adoption, are questions that must be determined by the personal law of the child.¹⁵

IS IT ONLY NATIVES OF THE SAME COUNTRY THAT CAN ADOPT?

§ 200. The adoption of a native of this country by a foreigner must be recognised as competent and effectual, in so far as it is not expressly forbidden

¹¹ So, too, Duguit, Forme, p. 99, with reference to Code Civ. 331. The rule would hold good, even if the judicial organisation and the powers of the officials in the different countries concerned were identical.

¹³ Laurent, vi. § 39; Fiore, § 153. German authorities do not, as a rule, express any opinion on this matter.

¹⁴ So Weiss, p. 740.

¹⁵ Thus, too, Fiore, § 153. But does this proposition not contradict the principle adopted by Fiore, of fixing the relations of the adoptive children to the parents exclusively by the personal law of the latter? The quality of the tie which continues to subsist between the child and his original family may, to a certain extent, depend upon the quality of the tie which is created between the child and his adoptive parent.

by law. The adoptive father does not acquire any public office or trust, but at the most a family authority which belongs to the sphere of private law, and in matters of private law the principle of the legal equality of natives and foreigners prevails. The practice in France¹⁶ is at present to the contrary, on the ground of the absurd theory of droits civils. It is required that both parties should be admitted to French nationality, or at least to the enjoyment of civil rights.¹⁷

EMANCIPATION.

§ 201. The termination of the power of the father, be it by the child attaining majority or by its marriage, or by some legal process specially directed to this object, i.e. emancipation in the strictest sense, is—with due regard always to the rule "locus regit actum"—to be determined by the personal law of the father. If the holder of paternal power and the child are of different nationalities, subject to different personal laws, the power of the father must come to an end, although according to the father's personal law it would continue, if by the personal law of the child it is to come to an end.¹⁸ A daughter is always emancipated by marriage, if the law of the new domicile makes the paternal power cease upon that event, since the wife follows her husband's domicile. The same rules as to the form of emancipation will prevail, as in the case of the form of the act of adoption.

3. RIGHTS OF THE FATHER IN THE PROPERTY OF HIS CHILDREN.

§ 202. The rights of the father in the property of his children are to be determined by the same principles¹ which decide whether and to what extent the personal law or the lex rei sitæ is to regulate questions of patrimonial rights between the spouses.² According to older German law, which was retained in various of the customary laws of France up to the time of the publication of the Code and according to the law of England, the lex rei sitæ is applied in the case of immoveables, while, according to

¹⁷ As a rule, adoption has not the effect of founding a new nationality. See supra, § 53 ad fin.

¹⁸ So Wächter, ii. p. 187.

² The personal law alone decides whether a son is under paternal authority or not. The usufruct of the father of an Englishman in an estate situated in the territory of the common law of Rome, terminates with his 21st year, since by the law of England the authority of a father terminates then. Merlin, Rép. Puissance Paternelle, vii. § 1.

the common law of Rome and modern French law, the personal law is the rule.³

The following exceptions are admitted:—

1st. The law, by which the rights of the father in the estate of the children are fixed, does not propose to settle these for all time, in the same way as the law with regard to the property of the spouses. The authority of the father, at least in modern law, is a legal relation which is terminated by his death. Besides, the father's right of property is not, like the rights of the spouses, subject to an unlimited power of contract in the parties interested, but rests upon the relation which jus publicum confers. This is determined by the actual personal law. Lastly, however, it cannot be the intention of a new personal law to disturb rights of property which have already arisen.⁴ On these reasons depends the correctness of the prevailing theory, which holds the personal law of property at the time of the alleged acquisition to be the rule, and not the personal law which existed at the date of the child's birth.⁵ But, of course, in such matters the rules "Res succedit in locum pretii," and "pretium succedit in locum rei," must be recognised, otherwise we should either find that an unnatural limitation would be placed on the administration of the property which belonged to the child, or a complete breach would be made in our principle.

³ Capacity to act is to be determined exclusively by the personal law. The lex rei sitæ should rule, according to Merlin, Rép. Puissance Paternelle, vii. § 1; Duplessis, Consult. xv.; Œuvres, ii. p. 77; D'Aguesseau, Œuvres, iv. p. 660; Boullenois, i. p. 68; Fœlix, i. p. 121; Gand, No. 473 (who even in moveables would have the lex rei sitæ prevail), and also according to the practice of the English common law.

The grounds adduced by these authors do not, however, justify their theory, which is, in its result, according to the older German and English law, correct. Merlin as cited: "La loi qui donne à un père l'usufruit des biens de son fils doit être réelle, parceque son objet est réel." The theory that in the case of real property the lex rei sitæ rules, and that we have then to do with what is called a statut réel, has more modern adherents in French jurisprudence, such as Troplong (J. v. p. 168). For the general validity of the lex domicilii, see Seuffert, Comm. i. p. 244; Walter, § 46; Bouhier, chap. xxiv. No. 47; Mittermaier, § 30, p. 116; Wächter, ii. pp. 187, 188; Unger, i. p. 195. Stobbe, § 34, after note 31; Fiore, § 164; Laurent, vi. § 1.

2nd. It is certain that, if the personal law allows it, the father can renounce a right of usufruct which the lex rei sitæ bestows upon him, and under similar conditions the son may acquire a foreign estate in such manner as to exclude the usufruct of the father. This must be the case if the son acquires an estate abroad out of his own funds, over which the father has no usufruct.⁶ In like manner it must be assumed that there is a reservation of the usufruct in favour of the father, if he acquires a property with funds of the son over which he has a usufruct, and the lex rei sitæ can, as a rule, therefore be applied only to estate which the son has inherited.

3rd. It is conceivable that the child should be subject to a personal law other than that of the father. This will, for instance, very likely be the case if, as in the law of France, the naturalisation of a father is not extended to his minor children who are still under his potestas.

In this case, is it the personal law of the father or that of the child which is to rule?

Laurent (vi. § 21) pronounces in favour of the former,⁷ principally because the legal usufruct of the father exists in his own interest. But it is not clear how a foreign law should possibly be the foundation, as a personal law, of rights over the property of a person who is in no sense subject to it. It is sounder to hold that family rights can extend no further than the law of the dependent member of the family permits them to do. Thus, in my opinion, the father can never claim higher rights than are conferred upon him by the personal law of the child. The only possible doubt is whether the father can enjoy higher rights than those which are conferred on him by his own law. As, however, the right of usufruct is closely connected with the law of administration, and as this latter right, in respect it is part of the law of curatory, must be settled by the personal law of the ward, the father's right of usufruct must also be exclusively

⁶ The intention of the donor or decessing person will decide in cases of donation or bequests mortis causa, and this intention may no doubt be determined by the law of an earlier domicile. Older authorities propose to apply the law of the earlier domicile in such cases on account of the possibility of dolus on the part of the father. See Merlin as cited, No. 2.

regulated by the personal law of the child.⁸ German authors have not given any definite utterance on these questions, because to them the law of the domicile is the personal statute, and the child's domicile follows that of the father. It is obvious that similar principles must govern our decision in any questions that may be raised as to the mother's rights in the property of her children.

4. OBLIGATION TO MAINTAIN AND DOWER.

§ 203. The obligation to maintain and dower which arises from kinship is to be determined by the personal law of the person against whom the claim is made. Effects of the family tie which are repudiated by the personal law of the person who is said to be liable to the obligation can, at the most, only arise through some act of his which may be interpreted as a subjection of himself to another territorial law, e.g. residence or marriage in a foreign country. Can it be that a foreign law should provide that A, who belongs to State X, and who has never set foot in the country of Y, should still be bound by Y's law to aliment a relation who lives there, although the law of X releases him from any duty of the kind?

It looks as if there could hardly be any hesitation in answering this question in the negative.¹ But yet the law of France² has more than once applied the personal law of the claimant, or at least the rules of French jurisprudence, against one who belonged to a foreign country, because the obligation of aliment is a part of ordre public. With this last argument we can, as we well know, prove a great deal. But in a case of this kind, the courts of the United States refused, and in our opinion rightly refused, to apply a French judgment. So long only as the person against whom the claim is made resides in the country, can the duty of aliment as part of the ordre public affect him. No exception, again, to the principle we have adopted can be allowed even in the case in which both parties once had the same personal law, the law, that is, of the person who now makes the claim; while the other party, by naturalisation in another country, has placed himself under a system of law which denies the obligation.³ For the right we are dealing with here is not an independent vested right acquired by any special act of the will, but with an obligation which flows directly from some other legal relation by virtue of a general rule of law. Again, in a case of a change from the sphere of one law to another within the same empire, the new law must certainly be applied.

⁸ So, too, Vesque v. Püttlingen, § 69 ad fin. and § 68; and Weiss, p. 750, in favour of the personal law of the child.

² Cf. the judgments reported in J. i. p. 45 [where a son-in-law claimed aliment from his dead wife's parents, he being French, they American] and J. iv. p. 428. Laurent, v. § 87, proposes to apply strictly to claims for aliment the law of the judge, if it recognises the obligation; for, says he, you have here a law of nature to deal with. He recommends, besides, that international treaties should be entered into. That is altogether capricious.

NOTE O ON § 203. CLAIM OF CHILDREN FOR ALIMENT.

[Claims for aliment will be viewed favourably by all courts, and will be enforced against parties not otherwise subject to their jurisdiction. This is a consequence of the claim being due ex debito naturali, and presumably the same in every civilised country. The French courts will allow one foreigner to sue another for aliment, although as a general rule they are closed to suits between foreigners (Bouchard, 1876, Trib. Civ. de la Seine, J. iii. p. 184). In another case, where the same rule was applied against a defender resident but not permanently domiciled in France, it was remarked: "The action is founded on a natural obligation, as well as consecrated by public law, and it touches public decency that it should be implemented" (Frings v. Mathyssens, 1879, Trib. Civ. de la Seine, J. vi. p. 489). French children have been held liable by the French courts to aliment their father, who had become naturalised in America, where no such obligation exists, on the ground that the paternal relation, on which the obligation was founded, took its origin before his American naturalisation (Trib. Civ. de la Seine, 1877, J. iv. p. 428). This would seem to be the general rule, although it was laid down by an Algerine court that the question of the obligation to aliment children, and the extent of that obligation, are to be determined by the law of the marriage (Broni Yso, 1882, J. ix. p. 626). In Scotland it has been laid down that personal presence in the territory for however short a time will found jurisdiction to entertain an action of aliment by a child against a father, the father having the child with him within the jurisdiction of the Scottish courts (per Lord Mackenzie in Ringer v. Churchill, 1840, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. p. 316).

The same favourable view is taken of claims for aliment by a wife against her husband. The court of any country where the husband resides will, according to French decisions, entertain a suit for aliment, and if the marriage is denied, process will be sisted until this question can be determined by the judge of the proper domicile (Ullmann, 1880, Cour de Paris, J. vii. p. 300). The general principle upon which this assertion of jurisdiction is advanced, is forcibly stated in a judgment of the Civil Tribunal of the Seine, and is put upon considerations which will hold good for all systems of jurisprudence: "Marriage is a contract belonging at the same time to natural law and to the law of nations; it creates for the spouses rights and duties which follow them everywhere, and which they are bound mutually to observe in a foreign country as fully as in their own; in particular, one of its results is the obligation on the husband to receive his wife in his house, and to supply her wants." Following out this general statement of the law, the court ordained a foreigner trading in France and resident there, to entertain his wife in his house, or otherwise to pay her a certain allowance (Stoops v. Stoops, 1878, J. v. p. 495). As to interim awards of aliment, while actions for divorce are pending, the courts of all countries will give temporary remedies to injured spouses, even where they have no jurisdiction to affect their conjugal relation permanently; residence of the husband in England will found jurisdiction for a judicial separation; indeed, the English courts will exercise even a jurisdiction for divorce upon the ground of residence; in Scotland, residence of the spouses, far short of that required to constitute a matrimonial domicile, will give the court jurisdiction in an action of separation and aliment (Fraser, 1294), and will enable it also to regulate the custody of the children. The Italian courts will authorise a wife to quit her husband's house in cases where they are not competent to pronounce any decree that will affect the relations of the spouses permanently (Nellinger v. Struve, App. Court of Milan, 1876, J. iii. 220). The French courts will award aliment to an injured wife, give her the custody of children, and allow her the expenses of a journey to the territory where her divorce must be sought (Subercasseaux, Trib. Civ. de la Seine, 1877, J. v. p. 45); and even if the expense be the expense of a voyage to America, it will be allowed against the husband, and extra expense admitted on account of the delicacy of one of the children of the marriage, who is to accompany the wife (ibidem). There will be inquiry to see if there be a probabilis causa, but the application for aliment and for expenses ad litem may be made in the French courts although no judicial steps have been taken there (Stern v. Stern, Trib. Civ. de la Seine, 1881, J. viii. 526). A French court may also put property under judicial management pending a divorce suit in a foreign court to which the French court is incompetent (Grabisheid, Cour de Cass. 19th April 1878, J. v. p. 506; Reber v. Reber, 1885, J. xii. 185), but the aliment or protection will only be given for such limited time as is sufficient to institute the action in a foreign court, or, in the case of protection of property, to carry through that action (Van Overbecke, 1881, Trib. Civ. de la Seine, J. vii. p. 303; Favre, 1881, J. ix. p. 627); interim aliment for children who have been awarded to the custody of the wife has also been allowed (Glover v. Glover, Trib. Civ. de la Seine, 21st January 1880).

OBLIGATION OF A FATHER TO ALIMENT BASTARDS.

§ 204. It is plain that the legal relations between the mother and her bastard children must be determined by the personal law of the mother. But both in practice and in the literature of the subject we are confronted with the most various views on the question as to what territorial law is to adjudicate upon the claims of the bastard against the true or possible father, and in particular upon his action for aliment, or reconnaissance forcée, as the jurisprudence of France calls it. The personal law of the mother at the date of conception, and at the date of birth, the law of the place of the copula, the personal law of the father, the lex fori, all have their advocates: while many think that the claim cannot be recognised except several of these systems concur in approving of it.

One theory, which formerly was widely entertained in Germany, holds the claim to be one arising from a delict, viz. that of illicit intercourse. Now, it is no doubt quite correct to regard as a claim on delict⁴ the claim which the law sometimes, and in particular where the modern common law of Rome prevails, allows of damages by the mother for defloration, provided always that there has been seduction. But it is impossible to recognise that the act which has given birth to the child is any violation of its rights, so as to give it an action founded on delict.⁵

The decisive point of time is rather to be determined as follows: The law, which finds the paramour liable in aliment, has the intention of exercising a permanent care for the welfare of the bastard and the mother. It will, therefore, so far as may be, apply to all bastards belonging to its own country, and conversely it will not apply to children accidentally born there of foreign mothers, if their own domestic law recognises no such protective care, or even, as may be the case, holds it to be a mischief. For the permanent protective care for persons is a matter for the State to

For the lex fori—Mittermaier, § 30 ad fin.; Savigny, § 374; Guthrie, p. 254; Schmid, p. 89; Vesque v. Püttlingen, p. 255 (because the question is one as to laws which rest on considerations of morality); Emminghaus, Pand. des Sächs. Rechts, p. 52; Code of Saxony, § 12, and the practice of the Sup. Ct. of Dresden of earlier date (Seuffert, xiv. § 196). A more recent judgment of the Supreme Court of Austria, of 26th September 1882 (J. xiii. p. 464), seems to hold that an action will lie, if it is sanctioned either by the lex fori or by the personal law of the defender. [The same court on 31st Oct. 1871 held that it was competent to give decree for aliment against the father of a bastard, in a case where both he and the mother were foreigners, and that the condition and measure of the claim was the law of the mother's domicile.]

which these persons belong. Accordingly, a child can only claim aliment under the conditions and to the amount which the personal law of the mother sanctions.⁶ But it is quite possible that the mother should in the interval between the copula and the birth of the child acquire a new personal law by being naturalised in another State, or acquire another domicile within the same State, in which a different law is recognised. Shall her personal law at the time of the birth or her personal law at the time of the copula rule? We must pronounce in favour of the latter. The claim of the child arises from the fact of procreation, although it is first brought into operation when the child comes into the world alive.⁷ Besides, on any other theory it would be possible for the mother to alter very materially at her good pleasure the obligation incumbent on her paramour, by changing her personal law in this interval.⁸ Lastly, no reason at all can be given for subjecting the father or paramour who is personally subject to another law, and has never stayed at the place of birth during the critical period, to the law of the place of the birth.⁹

It can, clearly enough, never be sufficient that the personal law of the mother gives the bastard the claim in question, since the paramour cannot be brought within the operation of this law without something further to establish his liability. It is necessary, too, that the claim should be recognised by the law of the place of concubitus, since we are dealing with an obligation which arises directly out of this act, even although there is

So, too, Holzschuher, i. pp. 79, 488; Stobbe, § 34, note 33; Dernburg, Preuss. Privatr. i. § 28, note 5; iii. § 68, note 10. The more modern French authorities proceed on the view that the question is one of a statut personnel. See Laurent, v. § 252; Folleville, pp. 505, 506; Brocher, i. p. 316; Weiss, p. 728.

⁷ So the more recent practice of the Supreme Court of Prussia. See judgments of 1st Feb. 1858 and 24th Feb. 1864 (Seuffert, xii. § 333; xxxii. § 3).

⁹ If there has been concubitus at several places with different systems of law, it is sufficient that the claims exist according to one of these systems. The child may choose that one which is most favourable to him on which to base his claim. It is enough that he may have been begotten at that place, and that the alleged father is subjected to its law by having lived there. Stobbe (note 36) pronounces this to be a sound inference, if we are to take the law of the place of the copula as the determinant. But see a contrary judgment of the Prussian Supreme Court of 19th June 1866 (Seuffert, xxii. § 1). The practice of Hesse (Roth, Kurhess Privatr. p. 603) takes this peculiar course, that if the law of the place of conception gives no claim, the lex fori may step in to regulate the matter. See, against this, Stobbe, ut cit.

no intention that it should arise.¹⁰ Whoever visits a particular country subjects himself to the laws that are there recognised as regulating this matter,¹¹ and these are the only laws that can apply to all who are domiciled there. A child, then, can only make these claims in so far as the personal law of the mother at the time of the conception, and the law of the country in which it is possible that the conception took place, allow them.

We have yet another qualification to add. The law of the place of action must not reject the action as one that is contra bonos mores; in support of this doctrine, it is pleaded that we must have recourse to the prohibitive character of the laws which rest directly on some conception of what is proper or decent, however mistaken that conception may be. For in such a case the court is being invoked to give immediate effect to a claim of which its own law, the lex fori, disapproves (see supra, § 36). This qualification is generally admitted.¹² Thus no one can institute any such action, where the rule of the French statute book, art. 340, or the Codice Ital. § 189, or the Code for the Netherlands, § 340, is in force, unless one of the exceptional cases therein provided for should occur.

§ 205. We have, however, this much to say. A rule of law of this kind, which sets bounds to the rights of bastard children, rests on a twofold foundation. In the first place, the law holds that the process of proving the claim, which is at the bottom of such actions, is injurious to public morality,¹³ and, in the second place, it desires to protect the peace of families against such claims.¹⁴ But neither of these reasons applies to the

¹⁰ See infra the law of obligations. [See also Ross, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. xix. p. 31.]

¹¹ See the judgment of the Supreme Court of Berlin cited in note 9 (1864).

¹⁴ In so far as the child makes a claim not merely for definite money payments or aliment, but for real family rights, the personal law of the alleged father must also be taken into account (see Brocher, Nouv. Tr. § 45). For one can only enter a particular family—even although the rights claimed are not those of a full member of it—in accordance with the personal law of its head. We must, therefore, always enquire carefully how far the claim goes; it may be well founded for one purpose, and ill founded for another.

case of a foreign child pleading the judgment of a foreign court, which has already established the paternity, against a foreigner. There is no need of more proof in such a case, and the protection of the foreign family in these circumstances can only be undertaken by their personal law.¹⁵ A foreign judgment of that kind could not, however, be pleaded against a Frenchman in France.¹⁶

But if the judge throws out the action on this ground solely, that by the lex fori all proof on the subject is excluded—e.g. if a French judge rejects a suit at the instance of a Saxon woman against a Saxon paramour—this judgment does not prevent the claim being advanced before the courts of some other State. The court has not said that there is no such claim, but merely that it must not be made before the courts of that particular country.

§ 206. But is it also necessary that the personal law of the fornicator against whom the claim is made should allow it, before any suit can be brought before the courts of some other country, e.g. a suit by the child in the country to which the mother belongs, which is also the place of the child's birth?

Weiss (p. 729) answers this question decidedly in the affirmative. He rests his judgment upon the point of view of the personal law, the law of the family, and refuses to recognise any obligatory tie in the matter, except in so far as the personal law on both sides allows it. But the claims, which e.g. the common law of Rome and the law of Prussia¹⁷ allows to the bastard, are not claims to be received into the family of the alleged father,¹⁸ a thing which could only be done in accordance with the personal law of the father; they are—although they may be based upon the assumption of a relationship which is nothing but a natural relation-

ship, albeit effectual as an impediment to marriage—simply claims ex obligatione for support, or for a contribution towards support. If, then, the legislation of any country approves of claims of the kind being made against the alleged father, it is not to be expected that it should give foreigners an exemption in accordance with the law of their own country, a privilege of seducing its own subjects for whose interests it pretends to provide. Fiore says very soundly (§ 143), although the Italian code has adopted the principle of the French law: “The Italian who has had sexual connection in a foreign territory with a foreigner, must be regarded as subject to all the legal consequences of his conduct.”

§ 207. On the other hand, the child can make no claim against a relative of his alleged father, e.g. against his father again, unless such a claim is allowed by the personal law of that relative. The father has not subjected himself to the law of the foreign country, and the son by his stay in that foreign country can only subject himself to its laws. The obligation of being responsible for the son is a pure matter of family law, and depends therefore on the personal law of the father.¹⁹

But, on the other hand, would it be enough if—always supposing that the lex fori allowed the action—the personal law of the mother as well as that of the father of the child approved of the claim?²⁰ If the child's claim is put upon natural kinship, we must say yes; and several German authors, on the ground of natural kinship, decide these claims generally according to the lex domicilii of the father.²¹ We believe, however, that unless you have a real recognition by the father you may speak of a possible relationship, but cannot describe it as a real relationship,²² especially if, as is the case in the prevailing theory of the common law

See, too, judgment of the Supreme Court of Bavaria, 5th May 1874: “The law of the family is to be tested by the law of the domicile, and the obligation to aliment which is here in question is to be derived from the relation of grandparent and grandchild, i.e. from the rules of family law.” Resolution of the same court on 24th February 1875 (Seuffert, xxx. § 222; xxxi. § 1). Stobbe, note 34 ad fin.

²⁰ Gunther, p. 732, v. Martens, p. 317, and Weiss, p. 729, set store substantially on the agreement of both of these laws.

²² See, in this view especially, the exposition by Windscheid, Pand. ii. § 475, note 18.

of Rome, and also e.g. in the code for Saxony, § 1872, the exceptio plurimum concubentium is not recognised, the objection, that is, that the mother within the critical period has had connection with several men.

The outcome of our views then is : Such claims are only permissible in so far as they exist, 1st, by the personal law of the mother ; 2nd, by the law of the place of concubitus ; and lastly, 3rd, by the law of the place where the action is brought. As a rule, the action will be brought at the domicile of the defender, and again this defender will, as a rule, be a citizen of the country in which he has his domicile. Thus in practice many of our difficulties will solve themselves, while, on the other hand, the reasoning on which many of the judicial sentences on this matter are based must be received with caution, since in many cases it happens that the points of distinction between the case on hand and some one theory are allowed to influence the judgment, while the points of distinction between it and a second theory are left out of account.

Again, there is a conflict of legal systems in all cases connected with this subject not merely when one system excludes a child's claims as a general rule and admits them in particular and exceptional cases,²³ but also when both systems admit the child's claims in principle, but differ in their way of regarding the particular case : for these exceptions, too, rest on considerations of morality, e.g. the exceptions made by the Prussian law of 24th April 1854.²⁴

III. GUARDIANSHIP AND CURATORY.

A. GUARDIANSHIP.

EXTRA-TERRITORIAL RECOGNITION OF A GUARDIAN APPOINTED UNDER THE PERSONAL LAW OF THE WARD.

§ 208. According to the theory of law which has come to the front in modern times, guardianship exists solely in order to ensure a permanent protection to the person of the ward, and this protective care must be ²³ The Code Civil and the Cod. Ital. recognise these exceptions.

entrusted to the State to which the ward belongs, and regulated by its law. This theory, which preponderated even in older times, may now be said to be universally recognised in the practice and in the legislation of the Continent of Europe,¹ while the jurisprudence of England and of the United States at least recognises it in principle as sound.²

The person who, by virtue of his relationship, enters directly on the office of guardian under the personal law of the ward, or who is appointed guardian in the State in which the ward has his home, is charged with the administration of the ward's property, whether it be in his own State or in another,^{3 4} and that without requiring any special authorisation by the State in which he is to act.⁵ The

The treaties collected in Krug (pp. 26-29) provide without exception that, as regards all moveables, the guardianship should be constituted by the court of the domicile, and recognised in the other State.

Kraut (Vormundschaft nach d. Grunds. des D. Rechts, i. p. 284) describes the theory adopted in the text, according to which the guardian appointed by the personal law or by the judge who controls the personal status of the ward, i.e. according to the tenor of German practice the judex or lex domicilii, has the right of managing real estate abroad, as the common practice of the German courts, from which some particular systems diverge.

One such divergence takes place with regard to the real estate of a foreigner which lies in Austria (Unger, p. 198; Vesque v. Püttlingen, § 75), and another by way of reprisal in Brunswick (cf. Steinacker, Privatr. des Herzogth. Braunschweig, p. 67, § 6).

All the treaties collected by Krug (Internationalr. pp. 26-29) from German States go to this, that the guardian who shall be named by the judex domicilii is to be recognised as regards all moveable goods within the territories of other States. But if there are foreign immoveables in question, then, according to some of these treaties, the guardian appointed by the courts of the domicile is to be recognised by the authorities of the other countries as having right to the estate. Others give the authorities of the court where the estate lies the power of appointing special curators as far as it is concerned, or of confirming the foreign curator, who must, however, in all his dealings with the estate in question, observe the conditions which the law of the place requires. (For the interpretation of this latter provision, see infra, note 25.) According to these treaties, the courts of both countries shall account to each other for the application of the income.

⁴ Cf. judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal at Kiel, 8th January 1840 (Seuffert, viii. § 148), which lays special stress upon this recognition by foreign courts as a general proposition of law.

⁵ Of course, we do not deny the competency of appointing separate guardians, on considerations of convenience, for different masses of property situated in different and distant countries. But these guardians will all the same be subject to the personal law of the ward, and to the same thing is to be said of the power of representing the ward in court.⁶

The opposite view, by which the validity of the appointment made at the domicile of the ward is not recognised, even as regards the moveables situated abroad,⁷ cannot be logically carried out. If that appointment is not recognised by the State, it has the right and the duty of appointing a guardian so soon as any piece of property belonging to the pupil falls into its territory. Otherwise, not only would the person who stands in need of representation by a guardian be deprived of all protection, and of the capacity of making contracts, but the subjects of that State would be placed in a most dangerous position if they desired to make contracts with such a person. A special guardian will probably not be appointed unless the rights of the ward are to be pleaded in some court.⁸ To require such an appointment in every case seems to be a mere oppression of one from whom the State exacts stamps and duties without making any return therefor, as it does when it appoints guardians to its own subjects. It is impossible, as we have seen in practice, to appoint a guardian for every foreigner who happens to be for a time in the country, or to possess moveable property there; and the matter, as a rule, is reduced to this, that it becomes necessary to appoint as guardian the person appointed at the domicile, who alone has the necessary information as to the circumstances of the ward.

It may be objected that, where a practice of this kind has grown up out of reasons of convenience, it should be maintained, and that where that is not the case, the principles that hold as to the sovereignty of individual States should rule; and that as the guardian is clothed with the character of an official of the Government, no one who is nominated to that office by a foreign Government can act in this country unless confirmed by the Government of this country. But although the guardian in modern times holds his position by appointment of the Government, yet that does not by court which has the control of all guardians at the home of the ward. Chavegrin, p. 576 (Protutelle).

Cf. e.g. L. 20, § 2; D. de excus, 27, 1. The provision in this passage, that the præsides of the various provinces where the property of the wards lies should appoint guardians, is to be treated as a rule of convenience which can only be applied within one territory. Provisions for the care of the pupil and his estate will be dealt with in a similar fashion by all courts within the same territory (and in the Roman empire the whole territory was one); and, therefore, it matters not which of the various offices appoints the guardian and superintends him. It is a different matter when the officers of different States are in question, who may be under different systems, and regulate their superintendence of guardians by different principles. In this case, too, it may seem convenient to appoint different guardians. The administration, however, must be managed through the judge of the pupil's domicile, and in accordance with the law of that domicile.

⁶ The modern English practice recognises the right of tutors and curators named abroad to appear in court. Westlake, Rev. vi. p. 402.

any means prove that he exercises any of the functions of a Government official.⁹ The truth is rather that, under certain limitations, he exercises a family authority which belongs to the father, as head of the family, in other cases. The difference merely consists in this, that the father holds his authority by direct provision of law, while the guardian holds his position by an act of the Government, proceeding likewise upon the ground of the common law of the country which regulates his personal status, and importing, therefore, the same effects as the paternal relation.¹⁰ It cannot, therefore, be said that a special license should be required in order to give a guardian appointed by Government officials the right to exercise the same powers which the father can undoubtedly exercise over the moveable property of his child in a foreign country.^{11 12} One might just as well require that the officials of a foreign Government should be confirmed, in order to entitle them to represent the subjects of that Government and follow out their rights in a foreign country.

An intermediate view proposes that the office of guardian should be recognised as far as regards the moveables situated abroad, but requires the appointment of a special guardian for the real property which the ward may have in another country.¹³ This is the theory which at the present day rules the practice of England and of the United States.

¹⁰ In Roman law, as is well known, there were many cases in which the guardian did not require any authority from the Government for the administration of the ward's property; he was by direct operation of law vested with all the powers of a guardian. Burge himself (iii. p. 1002) recognises that the appointment of a guardian or curator by the judex domicilii is to be recognised everywhere as far as the person of the ward is concerned.

¹¹ The person of the ward must be given up to the guardian if he demands it. Cf. English decisions cited by Wharton, § 263, and Westlake Holtzendorff, § 7. But the English practice (see Alexander, Jour. vi. p. 521), of which Wharton does not disapprove, seems often to avail itself of the expedient of confirming the appointment of the guardian who has been appointed in the country to which the minor belongs. [As to English practice and theory, see infra, p. 478 et seq.] Phillimore finds fault with English jurisprudence as unsatisfactory, and sets himself in theory to recognise out and out the personal law and the guardian named by it. It cannot, however, be gainsaid that the law of England, in reserving to itself a discretion whether it shall or shall not recognise a foreign appointment, has this advantage, that it can vigorously resist any abuse of the rights of guardianship on English soil. But, even by the Continental rules, restraints upon the personal liberty of the ward may be prevented as contrary to the jus publicum. If, again, dolus on the part of the guardian is supposed to exist, the court may refuse to give up the ward until correspondence has been had with the officials of the ward's domicile charged with the superintendence of curatories, and a provisional curator may be appointed. See infra, § 212.

¹² The analogy which Story, § 504, draws of the confirmation of foreign executors and administrators who wish to get possession of moveable estate belonging to a foreigner, and situated in a territory where the common law of England prevails, cannot be approved. In that case we have to deal with the institution in possession of one who previously had no rights; in the case of guardianship we have to deal with the exercise of a family authority over the pupil's person, and the representation of him by his guardian.

This theory may be carried out in practice,¹⁴ but it cannot, any more than the second theory, derive any support from the argument that the exercise of the office of a guardian, without previous confirmation by the authorities of the country where it is to be exercised, is an invasion of the sovereign rights of that country, any more than the second view, already dealt with, derives support from that argument. Moveables, so long as they are in any State, are subject to the sovereignty of that State no more and no less than immoveables: the distinction merely consists in this, that in the one case the hold of the State over the property is temporary; in the other it is permanent.

EXPLANATION OF THE ORIGIN OF THE OPPOSITE VIEW, BY WHICH FOREIGN REAL ESTATE IS NOT SUBJECT TO THE PERSONAL LAW.

§ 209. This view, however, may be historically explained as follows:—
In the first place, according to older German law, the nearest male country. Even in France there is a consensus of opinion that a decree by a foreign judge nominating a guardian does not require, in order to come into operation in France, to be declared "executory," i.e. to receive an exequatur as a decree in order processes does. Cf. Laurent, vi. § 53, p. 164. Cf. Fœlix, ii. § 466. P. Voet, 9, c. 2, No. 17, remarks: "Quamvis regulariter ab illo magistratu detur tutor, ubi pupillus domicilium habet ubi parentes habitarent: etiam qui dat tutorem, cum primario personæ non rei dedisse censetur, adeoque is, qui simpliciter datus est, ad res omnes etiam in diversis provinciis sitas datus intelligitur, id quod plerumque jure Romano obtinebat, quo diversarum provinciarum magistratus uni suberant imperatori. Ne tamen videatur Juxta domicilii quid extra territorium fecisse, non præjudicabit Judici loci, ubi nonnulla pupillaria bona sita, quin et tutorem pupillo ratione illorum bonorum scilicet immobilium recte dederit. Unde etiam si de prædiis minoris alienandis contentio, si quidem in alia sita sint provincia, tutius egerit tutor, qui datus est in loco domicilii, si decretum ab utroque Judici curet interponi et domicilii pupilli et rei sitæ." Cf. too, J. Voet, in Dig. 26, 5, No. 5: "Non autem in loco originis vel situs rerum pupillarium, sed tantum in loco domicilii pupillaris tutores a loco illius camera pupillari aut magistratu creari, moris est, qui hoc ipso dati intelliguntur universo pupilli patrimonio, ubicumque esistenti. Quod tamen ex comitate magis quam juris rigore sustinetur; quum in casu, quo pupillus immobilia habet sita in eo loco qui non subest eidem magistratui supremo, cui pupillus subest ratione domicilii, magistratus loci, in quo sita immobilia, rebus in suo territoris existentibus peculiarem posset tutorem dare." Malthæus, De Auction, i. c. 7, No. 10, is of another view: "Sic enim et tutor hodie a judice domicilii datus: nec tamen universorum negotiorum ad bonorum administrationem consequitur, nisi cessit iudex ejus territorii, in quo prædia sita sunt."

¹⁴ Wharton, § 263; Phillimore, § 554; Westlake Holtzendorff, § 156. This principle is recognised in the Argentine Republic, although the law of succession here, even in real estate, is furnished by the last domicile of the deceased. Cf. Dairea, J. xiii. p. 297, who finds fault with this as illogical. Unger, in Austrian law, seems to take this view. But it does not follow from § 225 of the Austrian Code. Vesque v. Püttlingen remarks, § 75: "If a foreign ward, to whom a guardian has been appointed in another country, owns real estate in Austria or Hungary, a curator for this estate (not a guardian) will be appointed by the proper Austrian or Hungarian official, while the acts of the officials of the foreign country, who are charged with matters of guardianship, are not allowed operation." The Saxon Code, § 1877, is peculiar and illogical: "Guardianship extends to property which is in another country, unless a special guardian for it is appointed," and § 1878: "If one who is under guardianship in another country has real property here, a special guardian for it must be appointed."

agnate of the ward,¹⁵ that is, the person who was entitled to succeed to his real property, either solely or at least for the greater part, was entitled to be appointed guardian;¹⁶ it was, therefore, no great step to hold that the right of guardianship was merely one of the effects of the succession to which the guardian was entitled; the influence was all the easier that by older Germanic law, in which the guardian merely protected the next heirs and rendered an account of his intromissions to them,¹⁷ guardianship truly existed, in the first place, in the interest of those next entitled to the succession, while, according to the provisions of many particular systems, the guardian actually drew the income of the estate for himself during the subsistence of the curatory.¹⁸ If, then, succession in real property was by that older law subject to the lex rei sitæ, we have an explanation of the fact that the position of the guardian is determined by the lex rei sitæ, and the operation of any appointment of a guardian is confined to the immovables situated in his own territory.¹⁹

In the second place, however, feudal law required the guardian of the vassal to pay the vassal's prestations to the overlord. It naturally depended upon the lex rei sitæ who could and should fulfil these duties, and it was necessary that the overlord should confirm any appointment to the office of guardian made abroad, especially as the older law made him the guardian himself of the feudal estate, and gave the office of guardian in other matters to another vassal. As the feudal relation was more widely prevalent in earlier times, we can understand that older writers could not distinguish accurately between this feudal guardianship and guardianship proper, which existed merely for the interest of the pupil; and, again, that the practice of England and the United States, since in theory the doctrines of the common law of these countries as to real property rest entirely upon feudal principles, should require the appointment of a special guardian, or at least the confirmation of the guardian appointed by the judex domicilii, for property situated in a foreign country.²⁰

Modern law, on the other hand, holds that guardianship has no other object than the interest of the ward; it cannot, therefore, be regarded as being derived from the law of succession or from feudal law; even in England the rights of the overlord in landed property have disappeared except in the case of real feudal holdings, which can be shown to have been given out by the Crown for a definite period, and to have fallen

Boullenois, iii. p. 30, and Bouhier, chap. xxiv. Nos. 63, 64, distinguishes ordinary guardianship from the Garde noble, which occurs in French customary law, and is a rule of the feudal system. See, too, Thöl, § 81 ad fin.

under the right of reversion.²¹ There is, then, no other tenable ground left to support the nomination of a special guardian by the officers of the State in which the property lies; and we must abandon that position all the more certainly that the result will be either that unnecessary expense and trouble will be incurred by confirming the guardian nominated by the judex domicilii, who will follow the principles recognised at the ward's domicile in the administration of the estate, or that the interest of the ward, in place of being advanced, will be exposed to the utmost disadvantages by the appointment of a special guardian, who will act according to the principles of the lex rei sitæ, and independently of the guardian appointed at the domicile of the ward.²²

No doubt, grounds of expediency may recommend the appointment of special guardians at the place where the estate is; but it must be administered according to the law of the ward's domicile. Loiseau takes the view that if different tutors are appointed in different countries the unity of administration, which is so much for the ward's advantage, will be likely to be imperilled, and the administration will be apt to be subjected to the lex loci actus, i.e. the law of the guardian. Accordingly, he recommends the appointment of simple agents, for whom the guardian who has been appointed in the country to which the ward belongs shall be jointly answerable. Perhaps that is a still more practical course: but, then, the appointment of these agents, who must in my opinion be salaried, will require to take place with the approval of the court that has the duty of superintending all such matters, in order to lighten the responsibility of the guardian. It seems not to be in accordance with our legal theories that there should be an unlimited responsibility for all the actings of an agent, which take place, it may be, in a distant quarter of the globe. Provisions of the law of Rome on such matters cannot, at this time of day, be appealed to as absolute rules.

PARTICULAR POWERS OF THE GUARDIAN. ALIENATION OF THE PROPERTY OF THE WARD IN PARTICULAR.

§ 210. It follows from these principles that the guardian has all the privileges which the personal law of the ward gives him, and no others.

²¹ The curatory which some of the German legal systems give over the estate of one who has disappeared (cf. Kraut, ii. pp. 217-266), which belongs, along with the right to the income, to the next heirs, must be regulated by the law which determines the right of succession to the estate of the person who has disappeared, and therefore in certain circumstances by the lex rei sitæ, but as a rule in Germany by the lex domicilii. So, too, by French law, Fœlix, ii. pp. 116, 205.

²² The matter is otherwise when different guardians are appointed by courts which are all in the same State, since both courts and guardians act on the same principles. It is, however, only recently that the Lord Chancellor of England has been empowered to name curators of lunatics to administer property in the colonies. Burge, iii. p. 1000. The courts of Scotland and England treat the appointments of guardians made by each other in the same way as if they had been made by some foreign State. Cf. Story as cited. [Infra, p. 480 et seq.]

This, for instance, will determine whether the guardian can alienate any subjects without the sanction of the court, and if so, what subjects, and again what payments he is entitled to receive.²³ The question, too, to what extent contracts of lease with reference to real estate belonging to the ward are good beyond the term at which the guardianship expires, is to be settled solely by the personal law of the ward. The other party has full opportunity of informing himself on this law: he cannot protect himself by appealing to the lex rei sitæ.²⁴

The alienation of the property of the ward, and the burdening of it with securities or hypothecs, constitute questions of importance, which are much disputed. Many authorities who desire that in other matters the lex domicilii should decide, and give the guardian appointed by the judex domicilii the right of administration even in a foreign country, make an exception in this case, because the question here is one as to the power to dispose of property, and does not affect the person of the ward.²⁵ But if, as Savigny remarks, a statute ordains that the property of a pupil is only to be alienated under certain restrictions, that constitutes a protective regulation for the person of the ward, who stands in need of protection; it is no mere regulation for the protection of the property, as an object of commerce which it is desirable to set on a firm basis, so as to assure the most advantageous return from it; such a theory would make the law a real statute. In order to ensure the true object, we require, for instance, the consent of the court which is charged with the superintendence of such matters, or of the family council, which can only be given after enquiry into the case on hand. It is only after such consent has been given that an act of alienation by the guardian is allowed to have the same effect as if it had been done by an owner of full age. The object of such a law is to give effect to the acts of the guardian: it is a personal statute, and not a real statute.²⁶ Again, it is out of the question to apply the rule "locus regit actum." For we are here concerned with a restriction upon the will of the guardian, and if we use the word "form," we must remember that it is not a question of form in this sense that the guardian may make up his mind to do what he pleases, so long as he observes a particular form of doing it.²⁷

If, on the other hand, the personal law of the ward prescribes a judicial sale, then the court of the place where the thing to be sold is, if it has the means of carrying out such sales, must observe the forms required by the lex rei sitæ, which are enacted in the interest of third parties (e.g. for the security of buyers).²⁸

On the other hand, other legal principles must determine whether a person under guardianship, or who has been under guardianship, shall be restored against prejudicial alienation, and what shall be the method and the extent of this restoration. Where we are dealing with real estate, the lex rei sitæ is primarily applicable. The question here is as to the general legal security of third parties, in truth as to the existence of a real right.²⁹ But there is no doubt much to be said for the view that, in so far as the personal law of the ward allows him a more restricted power of challenge ²⁶ The judge of the domicile or the personal law is therefore competent to pronounce decree de alienando. Kraut, ii. p. 147. Supreme Court of Austria, 4th Jan. 1870 (J. iii. p. 53). See Loiseau, p. 228, who, quite soundly, applies this to the question of taking up or rejecting a succession, even although the succession should per se be subject to the lex rei sitæ (e.g. according to the Franco-Russian treaty of 1874), or although questions as to the succession were assigned to another court; further, p. 236; Laurent, vi. § 123, and the judgment of the C. de Liège of 22nd Nov. 1864, cited by him.

²⁷ French law in such cases speaks of "formes habitantes."

²⁸ Laurent, viii. § 86, and Chavegrin, p. 580, discuss cases of this kind. If the personal law prescribes a sale at the place where the thing is situated, or if the court to which the ward in accordance with his personal law is subject orders such a sale in its discretion, special difficulties may arise. But still the decision is generally to be found by following the criterion in the text. The court which governs the personal status of the ward must eventually, if the two forms are irreconcilable, in our opinion choose, on an estimate as to which course will best insure the ward's interests, whether a sale shall take place according to his personal law, i.e. at his domicile, or at the place where the thing is situated, i.e. according to the rules of the lex rei sitæ. The law did not contemplate the case of a foreign and a divergent lex rei sitæ. To the same effect, C. de Bruxelles, 4th May 1886, J. xiii. p. 732. The court of the personal law ordered a sale in accordance with the rules of the lex rei sitæ. See, too, the discussion J. vii. p. 292; Sup. Ct. of North Carolina, J. xv. p. 143, and the editor's note.

²⁹ See decision of the Ct. of Cassation for the Rhine at Berlin, 1847 (Seuffert, ii. § 2).

than the lex rei sita, to that extent the personal law of the challenger is to be the rule.³⁰

Further, we must distinguish the question of the validity of the alienation from the question as to the responsibility of the guardian. The alienation may be quite valid, let us say of moveables, and yet the guardian may be answerable to the ward, if he has neglected the proper form of alienation, e.g. sale by public auction, or after valuation by a sworn appraiser, which is prescribed by the personal law of the ward in his interests, a form which, it may be, is not necessary by the law of the place where the thing is, or where the alienation took place, but yet might have been observed (cf. Loiseau, p. 225).

DOES THE NATIONALITY OR THE DOMICILE OF THE WARD DECIDE?

§ 211. In our view, and in the view of most of the modern French and Italian authorities, the nationality³¹ and not the domicile of the ward must as a matter of principle rule in cases of guardianship.

But in the law of guardianship we find it specially to be the case that, in carrying out this principle, practical difficulties have to be overcome.³² The ward may, if, for instance, the father has died abroad, have his residence in a locality at a very great distance from the country to which he belongs. In such a case his interests may suffer real prejudice. It will, too, often be impracticable to supply at the ward's domicile the legal arrangements which his national law postulates as being in operation. For this reason, there has recently been a plea set up by the Swiss jurists Curti³³ and Martin³⁴

³⁰ This is overlooked in the judgment of the C. de Liège of 1879, reported in J. viii. p. 87, which allowed a Dutchman an action of reduction according to the provisions of the 1304th article of the Code Civil within the period of ten years, whereas his personal law allowed him a period of no more than five. See Renault's note (J. viii. p. 88).

³¹ Fiore, § 174; Lomonaco, p. 98; Durand, § 173; Bard, § 172; Weiss, p. 596; Trib. Seine, 31st January 1861 (J. ii. p. 380); Lyon-Caen (J. viii. p. 168); Chavegrin, p. 501; Loiseau, p. 137; v. Martens, § 75, p. 318. Nationality is the rule in Austria. Cf. Starr, Die Rechtshülfe in Oesterreich, p. 227.

³⁴ J. vi. p. 129, with special relation to the Franco-Swiss treaty of jurisdiction of 15th June 1869, the 10th article of which provides thus, viz.: "La tutelle des mineurs et interdits Suisses, résidant en France, sera régie par la législation de leur canton d'origine et réciproquement, la tutelle des mineurs et interdits français, résidant en Suisse, sera réglée par la loi Française. En conséquence les contestations auxquelles l'établissement de la tutelle et de l'administration de la fortune pourront donner lieu seront portées devant l'autorité compétente de leur pays d'origine, sans préjudice toute fois des lois qui régissent les immeubles et des mesures conservatoires que les juges du lieu de la résidence pourront ordonner." A decision of the Swiss Federal Court of 1st June 1877, and also one of the Swiss Federal Council, have accordingly laid down that the judge of the domicile cannot name a guardian either to a Frenchman domiciled in Switzerland, or to a Swiss domiciled in France. This supersedes the former rule of practice at Geneva. Martin infers that the result is that in many cases guardians are not named at all. On the other hand, Brocher, Commentaire pratique et théorique sur le traité Franco-Suisse du 15 Juin on behalf of the application of the principle of domicile;³⁵ the French writer Gerbaut (§ 402) has taken the same line. But it is feasible either to provide that the last domicile which the ward or his father possessed in their native State, should come in place of the real domicile,³⁶ or else—and this would be undoubtedly a more practical course where the distances were great, although it could only be carried out by means of statutes or treaties—the consul of the State of nationality might be allowed to take the place of the judge of that country, and to set up and carry on in the State of the domicile the guardianship in accordance with the law of that other State. A provision of that kind actually exists in a large number of modern consular treaties, concluded by France with other countries,³⁷ and in some of the consular treaties very recently concluded by the German Empire it is provided³⁸—after the treaty has spoken of the powers and privileges of the consuls as regards the contract of successions—thus, viz.: “They (the consuls) shall likewise have the power of instituting a guardianship or 1869, p. 73, and Lehr, J. vi. p. 533, take up the principle of nationality, which is adopted by that treaty just as much as the principle of the unity of the guardianship. Here the indistinctness of the conception of domicile in Swiss legal usage is insisted on, while Martin, on the other hand, overlooks the fact that it happens that the canton of Geneva has a statute book, which in its material provisions is identical with that of the other party to the treaty [France]; hence there is no difficulty in substituting domicile for nationality. At the same time, if we once assume that guardianship is dependent on the national law of the ward, and not on the law of his domicile, it would be wrong to commit the power of guardianship, as Loiseau proposes to do (p. 167), to the foreign judex domicilii where the material legislation of the States in question is to the same effect. According to the principle of nationality, the competency of the judex domicilii has no existence except it is recognised by the judge of the nationality, and the likeness of the two legal systems can make him or the officials of the domicile competent. In practice, too, it may be noticed that in spite of the similarity of two systems of law—which, as a rule, is not a complete similarity—the rules of practice take very different shapes in different countries.

³⁵ In the so-called Concordat Cantons of Switzerland [i.e. cantons of Zürich, Bern, Luzern, Solothurn, St Gall, Aargau, and Turgau], the proper jurisdiction for matter of guardianship and curatory is the State of the citizenship, but on the request of this State officials of the domicile may act. They can, too, always supplement and assist the powers of the jurisdiction possessed by the State where the citizenship exists. But the merits of every case are determined by the law of the State where citizenship exists (Huber, Schweizer. Privatr. i. 1886, p. 89). Gerbaut proposes that the judex domicilii shall apply the national law of the ward. But in cases of protracted administrations that would often lead to very great and often insoluble difficulties, since questions of competency and material rights are often inseparably mixed up, particularly as regards the sanctioning of contracts.

³⁶ Preussische Vormundschaftsordnung, 5th July 1875, § 5: “If there is no such jurisdiction as is required by §§ 2-4, then the court in which the father, or the unmarried mother, or the incapax who is to be put under guardianship had his last domicile, and, failing such, any court appointed by the Minister of Justice is competent.”

³⁷ See Chavegrin on these treaties, pp. 503, 504.

³⁸ In our view, if the subject is closely considered, no international treaty would be necessary, in so far as the consul does not exercise any coercive powers (e.g. impose penalties as an official charged with guardianship would, and see that they are exacted). It is in the last resort immaterial whether a State has the affairs of its subjects superintended by an official from its own territory, or whether it entrusts some one in another territory with them. Loiseau (p. 169) lays down that functions of this kind cannot be exercised without the permission of the State in which the consul resides. That may be communis opinio in France. No special reason for it is given.

curatory over subjects of the country they represent, in accordance with its laws, in so far as concerns the successions in question.”³⁹

PROVISIONAL GUARDIANSHIP FOR PERSONS WHO ARE NOT CITIZENS.

§ 212. It is, however, admitted even by those⁴⁰ who take up the principle of nationality or citizenship,⁴¹ that the State may name a provisional guardian in cases in which the person has his domicile,⁴² or, where there is special reason for despatch, has a mere temporary residence in the State in question. This may be described as a duty of humanity, which the State in question—the country to which the child belongs as a citizen being at a distance—must now and again discharge: it must also, no doubt, be discharged if the nationality of the child cannot be established, or cannot at the moment be established.⁴³ Such a provisional guardianship must come to an end, when the State to which the child belongs sets up

³⁹ See treaty with Greece, 26th November 1881, art. xxii. subsec. 4; with Servia, 6th January 1883 (Reichsgesetzblatt, 1882, p. 118; 1883, p. 68); treaty with Italy, 21st December 1868, art. ii. ad fin. (Gesetzblatt des norddeutschen Bundes, 1869, p. 122). It may be gathered, however, from these treaties that the nomination of a guardian by the consul is confined to the case in which that is necessary in connection with the management of a succession, and where all parties concerned belong to the State which the consul represents, and to which the deceased himself belonged. This is expressly provided e.g. in the 21st article of the German Brazilian consular treaty of 10th January 1882. In other cases the consul, on his own motion, and if there are no special grounds for opposition, is to be appointed guardian to persons who belong to his own State by the officials of the country.

⁴⁰ Gand, § 489; Vesque v. Püttlingen ut cit. In Austria, accordingly, a guardian is named to every child who is left by a deceased foreigner in Austria. Fiore, § 174 ad fin.; Aubry et Rau, i. p. 264.

⁴² The principle of domicile is the prevailing principle both in the doctrine and the practice of Germany at the present time as regards guardianship. (Cf. Sup. Ct. of Celle, 29th May 1873, Seuffert, xxviii. § 141; but in Austria the principle of nationality is recognised, Vesque v. Püttlingen, § 74, p. 257, and judgment of the Supreme Court of Austria, 21st November 1876, J. viii. p. 167, and so, too, the Saxon Statute Book, § 16, 1877-1879.) The Prussian ordinance of 1875, §§ 2-5, subjects all Prussian subjects, as occasion shall arise, to the provisions of their ordinance and to the Prussian courts which are charged with such matters, and also non-Prussians who have a residence in Prussia (§ 6). On the other hand, the last subsection of § 6 provides: “Guardianship of a non-Prussian must be surrendered to the officials of the State to which he belongs upon their demand.” That means that the principle of nationality is recognised as the regulative principle, and that of domicile is only invoked as a subsidiary principle. It is a doubtful and disputed point, whether a guardianship can be set up in Prussia over a non-Prussian who has his domicile too in some foreign country. Although Dernburg, § 16, note 15, does not desire to see a guardianship set up in Prussia, at the last residence of the father in Prussia, if there is one set up at the child’s own domicile, others are of opinion that the Court which is competent according to the terms of the 5th article of the ordinance may make good its right to deal with the matter.

one for itself.⁴⁴ On the other hand, it will not be excluded by the bare possibility that the consul of the State to which the child belongs may organise a guardianship according to the provisions of some treaty. In such provisional curatories the fact of the provision which must be made for the ward's welfare comes into play, and it may very well be that a consul, who has his residence at some distance, should omit to set up any guardianship.⁴⁵ The questions of competency must, it is plain, be determined by the court which is to award the curatory or guardianship, and legal proceedings which have been taken under the authority of the provisional guardianship, cannot be attacked on the ground that they are not in accordance with the laws of the State to which the ward really belongs,⁴⁶ if these proceedings are within the limits of a provisional administration,⁴⁷ or if they are set on foot while it is not as yet shown to be likely that the ward has any nationality in another country. The opposite view⁴⁸ would make it as a matter of fact impossible, or at least in the highest degree perilous for general legal intercourse, to put into operation this international duty to humanity. If, however, a guardian brings an action for debt on behalf of his ward, the debtor who is sued must be free to plead that the appointment of the guardian was made by some officer who was not entitled on principles of international law to make it,⁴⁹ for the question ⁴⁴ Trib. Civ. Seine, 6th August 1885 (J. xii. p. 685). In France the form of declaring the decree of the foreign court to be executory is observed. Cf. Clunet, J. ut cit. Sup. Ct. at Lübeck on 20th November 1877 (Seuffert, xxxiv. § 154) as to the competency of awarding a curatory.

⁴⁵ Chavegrin, p. 509.

⁴⁶ Cf. Gianzana, ii. § 229. The App. Ct. of Turin (6th April 1881) expressed the opinion that if it should subsequently appear that the Italian court had no jurisdiction to award a guardianship, the acts which the Italian guardian had done would not be null on that account, especially if the ward was generally reputed to be an Italian.

⁴⁷ To the same effect a judgment of the Sup. Ct. of App. at Lübeck, 6th March 1827 (Seuffert, iv. § 131). In this judgment the resemblance to a negotiorum gestio is suggested.

⁴⁸ It may seem doubtful whether, in a guardianship thus set up for a foreign ward in subsidium, the material provisions of the law of the State to which the ward belongs are to be observed. In strictness this question must be answered in the negative. As it is difficult in the law of guardianship to distinguish between provisions which are formal and those which are material, it is scarcely possible to tie down a guardian, or a court which is exercising the duty of guardianship, strictly to the provisions of a foreign law, and the reasons which recommend the recognition of the competency of a foreign State to undertake a negotiorum gestio, must to a certain extent also recommend the recognition of the material provisions of its law upon guardian and ward. Of course, we should not forbid all reference to the native law of the ward, when it is known. See note, § 34, as to the Swiss practice in this respect.

⁴⁹ Cf. the judgment of the Hanseatic Supreme Court of 5th March 1881 (Seuffert, xxxvii. § 126). I cannot altogether adopt the grounds of this judgment, which in my opinion are rather rash. The rules of the Roman law as to the invalidity of the acts of a tutor falsus to bind the minor do not apply to this case. The State authority which acted for the minor whose nationality is not ascertained, is, according to international principle, competent to do so until it is ascertained. But, on the other hand, there is no presumptio legalitatis in favour of its competency, as the judgment imports, not even in the relations of the German courts inter se. The common organisation given to these courts by the Imperial statutes of 1879 has reference merely to matters of contentious jurisdiction, not to those of voluntary jurisdiction.

in this case is not one involving the challenge of an act which has been completed, but is concerned with an act which is yet to come, viz. the payment of the debt, and an error committed in the past cannot interfere with the rectification of the matter for the future. Again, a provisional guardianship is not to be set up,⁵⁰ if, by the law of the State to which the ward belongs, there is no guardianship at all to be constituted, but all the responsibility of providing for the person who requires protection, and the duty of representing him, passes over without enquiry to some relative, it may be the mother. If the State to which the ward belongs holds that this is a sufficient measure of protection, there is no occasion for the other State to proceed further in the matter.⁵¹

CHANGE OF NATIONALITY BY THE WARD.

§ 213. If the ward becomes naturalised in another State, the duty of guardianship must be transferred to it.⁵²

Apart from any special statutory or treaty provisions, there is no longer a duty of carrying on the guardianship for these persons who have become foreigners.⁵³ (Of course, a different case is presented if the principle of domicile is the ruling principle.) The question how the guardianship is to be wound up is a question entirely for the court by which it was set up.

CAPACITY FOR GUARDIANSHIP AND RIGHT TO DEMAND IT.

§ 214. What law rules the capacity for guardianship and the right to demand it?

Since guardianship exists in the personal interest of the ward, the personal law of the ward must settle all questions as to the capacity of any person to hold the guardianship, and also all claims by particular

⁵³ Hitherto the practice in Prussia has been that guardianship in the Prussian courts shall last until the proper foreign court assumes it. On the other hand, by Prussian law the guardianship must be given up to the foreign court, if a woman who is minor by the law of Prussia marries a foreigner, and thus becomes a foreigner, and the guardianship will be dissolved if, and so soon as, the law which now regulates her status pronounces her to be major. Cf. Philler, Vormundschaftsordnung, § 49, note 225.

persons to do so.⁵⁴ We must not, however, be led astray by the expression, "capacity of the guardian."⁵⁵ If the law negatives the capacity of certain persons to be guardians, that is at bottom equivalent to saying that these persons cannot become guardians, and perhaps even that acts done by them in the character of guardians are to be regarded as invalid,⁵⁶ and it is plain that the exclusion of certain persons, who are considered unfit for the office, is done in the interest of the ward. If his personal law, which is charged with the permanent protective care of him, admits certain persons to act as his guardians, who would be excluded by the State to which they themselves belong, that is a matter of perfect unconcern to this latter State. Besides, we have here to deal with a general incapacity to have rights, and not with incapacity to do particular acts, and the rule which we laid down supra, § 137, in regard to general incapacity to have rights, leads naturally to this conclusion. Nor can we admit any exception to this rule,⁵⁷ in the case of incapacity arising from a criminal sentence.⁵⁸ The correct view rather is to admit exceptions only so far as the person who would otherwise be selected or summoned, or be entitled to be summoned, to be guardian is under an incapacity to do particular acts. To appoint such a person to be guardian is absurd, and capacity to act is no doubt to be tested by the personal law of the man who is to act, or who has acted.⁵⁹

But another result of what has been said is, that any one who desires to be appointed guardian cannot appeal to his own personal law as giving him any special right to claim it. The appeal must be to the personal law of the person who is to be put under his care.⁶⁰

⁵⁴ In particular Chavegrin, p. 512; Loiseau, p. 197.

⁵⁵ Cf. Preussische Vormundschaftsordnung, § 21.

⁵⁶ That would be, if the guardian had been judicially and formally appointed, a very important result of the expression, which in my opinion is very inappropriate, "incapacity for guardianship."

⁵⁷ So, too, grounds for depriving the guardian of his office are to be determined solely by the personal law of the ward. Chavegrin, p. 513.

⁵⁸ Cf. e.g. Preuss. Vormundschaftsordn. § 21, No. 3; Deutsches Stafgesetzbuch, § 84, No. 6.

⁶⁰ Laurent, vi. § 45; Brocher, i. p. 353; Chavegrin, pp. 513, 514; Loiseau, p. 190; Weiss, pp. 596, 597. The French practice, according to the terms of a judgment of the Court of Cassation (Chambre Civ.), of 13th Jan. 1873 (J. i. p. 245), is different. Cf. C. Bourges, 4th Aug. 1874; Trib. Civ. Seine, 5th April 1884 (J. iii. p. 31, and J. xi. p. 521). The grounds of these decisions are sharply criticised by these authors, and indeed are untenable. In the decision of the Court of Cassation the question was as to the rights of a mother by § 390 of the Code Civil, who, after having become by her marriage the subject of a foreign State, had, as a widow, regained her French nationality, while her minor children remained the subjects of the foreign State. The proposition is stated that the principles of sovereignty do not allow foreign laws to be pleaded before French courts to the effect of ousting the rights and interests of French subjects. Anything may be proved by this argument. In another of these judgments the sheet anchor, the inevitable "ordre public," makes its appearance. Indirectly these judgments are due to the fact that French law does not allow minors to be naturalised.

§ 215. But is a foreigner as such incapable of acting as guardian, or rather excluded from it?

Since the guardian exercises, as we have said (§ 208), no public office, but rather a family duty, it follows from the principles of international law which are recognised nowadays that there can be no doubt of the capacity of a foreigner to hold the office, unless some special provision of the law of the country prevents it. This is the view generally adopted.⁶¹ The opposite theory, which was once largely held by French jurists,⁶² meets nowadays with more and more opposition. The absolute exclusion of foreigners would frequently be very prejudicial to the interests of the ward, if, for instance, the nearest relative happened to be a foreigner. Of course, the fact that a particular person is a foreigner may often be a good reason for not appointing him, if the authority charged with the conduct of these affairs has an uncontrolled discretion in its choice.⁶³

OBLIGATION TO TAKE UP A GUARDIANSHIP.

§ 216. The personal law of the person selected to be guardian must rule his obligation to assume the office, because that obligation is a general duty lying on the subjects of the State.⁶⁴ No one can be bound to assume a foreign guardianship, if in similar circumstances he would not be bound to assume the duty in his own country. The reasons for declining the office must, therefore, be tested by the personal law of the person selected for the office. It is quite true that one could not say that any principle of public law was transgressed, if a State, which in other respects followed the principle of nationality, laid upon all persons domiciled in its territory, so long as they should retain this domicile, the duty of assuming guardian-

⁶¹ Fiore, § 178. In ancient Rome it was of course otherwise: foreigners had neither the testamenti factio nor the right of agnation. Laurent, vi. § 45; Bard, § 178; Durand, § 174; Chavegrin, pp. 516, 517; Loiseau, p. 100 and p. 134; C. de Cass. 16th Feb. 1875 (Bard ut cit. and J. ii. p. 544); Trib. Civ. Briey, 24th Jan. 1878 (J. vi. p. 285); Trib. Civ. Versailles, 1st May 1879 (J. vi. p. 397); C. Paris, 2nd Aug. 1879 (J. vii. p. 196); and Clunet (J. ii. p. 441). French law now lays it down that the right of guardianship may fall to a foreign relative ipso jure. So, to the same effect, C. de Bruxelles, 4th April 1879 (rep. by Dubois, Rev. xiii. p. 64), a decision which recognises in tutory a "droit de famille." See, too, decisions from the Netherlands, Hingst, Rev. xiii. p. 412. Foreigners are recognised as competent guardians by the Prussian Vormundschaftsordn. of 1875; Dernburg, Vormundschaftsr. p. 193. Before its date the Preuss. Allgem. Landr. ii. 18, § 256, required foreigners who had no proper forum of their own in the country, to obtain the approval of the Minister of Justice (Philler, Vormundschaftsordnung, pp. 58, 61).

ship if required. But yet this is not a matter of course, and we find that the Prussian ordinance, although it does not by any means apply the principle of nationality in its full force, by its § 20 binds Prussians only to take up guardianships in Prussia, and does not so bind persons who are only domiciled in Prussia.⁶⁵

If we start from this point of view, viz. that certain grounds of declinature are admitted, not merely out of favour to the person who claims exemption, but that in certain cases an appeal is allowed to the judgment of the person, as to whether he considers himself qualified to undertake the office, or holds it to be possible to carry it on along with his own affairs, etc., we must, as Chavegrin does (p. 514),⁶⁶ allow the person who is called to the office to advance the grounds of declinature, which the personal law of the ward recognises, as well as those which are admitted by his own law.

But can a man's own law ever hold him bound to undertake a foreign guardianship?

It certainly cannot do so, if the foreign guardianship involves a heavier burden for the guardian than his own law imposes, be it by way of the caution required, or be it in the amount of business to be done. But it would be sounder to negative the existence of any such duty, even when the two systems of law are the same, because the guardian, by taking up the office, would in many respects be made subject to the foreign courts, or be forced to have recourse to them, and his position would thus be far from being identical with that of a guardian in his own country.⁶⁷ Of course, treaties may alter this, and in the case of different provinces of the same State a different rule may have grown up, although each province has a system of guardianship that differs from that of its neighbouring provinces.

As a consequence, too, we must hold that the obligation to carry on a guardianship, which has been assumed, ceases when the guardian is naturalised in another country and settles there. Only before he gives up his office he must count and reckon, and must give timely notice beforehand to the officials charged with the superintendence of such matters, of his intention to lay down his office.

OBLIGATIONS OF THE GUARDIAN. HIS RIGHTS OF CONTROL OVER THE PERSON OF THE WARD.

§ 217. The obligation of the guardian, arising from the assumption of a guardianship, to give up an inventory, to render accounts, to find caution, ⁶⁵ So the draft of a civil code for the German Empire, § 1639. Cf. the reasons given for it, vol. iv. p. 1063: "On the other hand, foreigners, even if they live in Germany, shall not be obliged to undertake a guardianship."

⁶⁶ Loiseau, p. 203, seems to arrive at the same result.

⁶⁷ In my first edition (p. 359) I made the obligation depend on the discretion of the judge. Loiseau (p. 202) refuses to recognise any distinction in principle between foreign and native guardianship, and therefore, in spite of the use of the word "citizen" in articles 431, 432, he will not lay any obligation on foreigners who are domiciled in France.

and to keep the ward indemnis, can only be ruled by that law to which is committed the charge of the ward, i.e. the personal law of the ward himself;⁶⁸ the legal system which prevails at the place where the thing in question is situated, must charge itself with providing in this way for the protection of the ward, if it is to appoint the guardian, or regulate his conduct, a thing which in our opinion is unreasonable. All these duties are simply applications and consequences of this protective care, and as they are part of the jus publicum, the guardian must submit himself to them; he cannot, as men can do in the case of contract obligations, appeal to his own personal law against them.

The disciplinary powers of the guardian over the person of his ward are primarily dependent on the personal law of the ward, but must not be extended beyond what the law of the place of residence allows, just as is the case with regard to the powers of correction lodged in the father. That is true in particular of the right to require the detention of the ward in a house of correction. Loiseau (p. 206) rightly says, however, that we must not be too ready to discover a transgression of "ordre public" in the case of private chastisement, which is inflicted by one foreigner on another in accordance with their own laws. On the other hand, a right of chastisement can never be well founded merely on the law of the place of residence.

As to the statutory right of security over the property of the guardian, which many legal systems give to the ward, reference is made to the discussion of the law of pledge infra.

B. CURATORY.

§ 218. Every other kind of curatory¹ must in the same way depend on the personal law of the person who is intended to be protected by it.² Here, however, it will more frequently be necessary for the courts of the domicile, or of the place of residence, to intervene as a provisional measure, ⁶⁸ Bouhier, cap. 26, § 206, cap. 28, § 83; Schäffner, p. 124; Unger, p. 199; Stobbe, § 34, on note 37; Dernburg, Vormundschaft, § 58, note 4.

² If, for instance, the personal law requires a curator to be appointed to conduct a process, he must be appointed by the judge who is designated by the personal law of the party, e.g. the married woman, and not by the judge before whom the process is dependent. (So Sup. Ct. of App. Kiel, 31st May 1854; Seuffert, xv. § 94.) According to the ratio decidendi in a judgment of the Swiss Federal Court, of 10th June 1876, the competency of the Swiss authorities to appoint a curator to a person on account of prodigality, would cease the moment that the alleged prodigal acquired citizenship in the United States (J. iii. p. 231). A decision of the Supreme Court of Austria, of 31st July 1878 (J. x. p. 72), lays down that nationality will determine the competency of a declarator of prodigality. See, too, Ct. of Cass. at Turin, 1st June 1874 (J. i. p. 330). If the nationality be doubtful, of course the judex domicilii may intervene, C. de Bruxelles, 4th June 1873 (Dubois, Rev. vi. p. 279). Esperson (J. xi. p. 174) declares in favour of a concurrent jurisdiction in the judex domicilii; so the App. Ct. at Milan, 1st July 1872, and Dubois (J. iii. p. 213): but the reasons given support nothing more than a jurisdiction in subsidium. It is different where there is danger in delay. In such cases, § 55 of the German Civilprozessordnung provides for a provisional appointment of a curator by the court in which the process is pendent.

in cases, e.g. in which a foreigner is suddenly seized with mental disease.^{3 4} But, in a sound view, even provisional intervention of that kind will be excluded, if the personal law positively refuses to recognise the circumstances of the case as a reason for setting up a curatory, e.g. if an attempt is made in Germany or France to place an Englishman under curatory, on account of extravagance, which is unaccompanied by any mental unsoundness.⁵ But, on the other hand, a curatory which is justified by the personal law will not be allowed to operate to any effect in the country in which the person is resident, if in this latter country a curatory of the kind is regarded as an unwarrantable restriction of personal liberty.⁶ Thus the curator appointed to a prodigal in Germany or France will not be allowed to sue in England on his behalf.

In regard to curatories as well as guardianships, we shall best get rid of difficulties by the co-operation of consuls.⁷ The question whether a person can be taken by force to an asylum, must always be determined by the law of the place in which the constraint and detention are to take place. There is a direct question of personal liberty raised. The right of a curator appointed at the ward's own home, to demand the application of force and detention in an asylum, must be tested by the domestic law of the ward.⁸

There are besides curatories which by no means exclusively, or even mainly, exist in the interest of a particular person, in which e.g. some particular estate is to be protected in the interest of a person who has yet to be ascertained. Such curatories are a mere annexum to some other legal relation, for the protection of which they are called into existence. Among them we find the cura hereditatis jacentis, the cura ventris nomine and the cura ex Carboniano edicto according to Roman law. These last

⁴ It may be of practical advantage to appoint a local curator besides the one whom the lunatic has in his own country. On the other hand, the determination by a foreign court that a man is mad, constitutes no res judicata; the condition of the person may change. Cf. Wharton, § 268.

⁷ Cf. Weiss, p. 618, and Trib. Seine, 26th December 1882 (J. x. p. 51).

If, however, the law attaches certain legal results to the detention in an asylum in this country, e.g. the nomination of a curator with certain powers (as the thorough-going French statute of 1838 does), the same consequences cannot be attached to detention in an asylum in another country, for the reason that the powers of control are not the same. C. Donal, 9th August 1886 (J. xiv. p. 176).

curators are therefore controlled by the law which regulates the succession, i.e. the last personal law of the deceased,⁹ and to this extent the distinction which some writers have taken between a curator personæ, and a curator bonis dandus, is of importance.¹⁰

APPENDIX.

CONFLICTS OF JURISDICTIONS.

§ 219. Questions as to the assumption or award of guardianships or curatories sometimes give rise to conflicts of jurisdiction of a positive and negative description between the supreme authorities of the different States which are charged with the care of such matters.¹ It has been proposed to institute courts of arbitration to get rid of these conflicts, in the course of which the interests of the wards may suffer considerably.² But any attempt to constitute such courts strikes at once on great difficulties,³ and is all the less likely to prove satisfactory, in respect that in civil practice the question is not so much one as to the termination of this or that disputed case, but is rather concerned with the establishment of a certain uniform practice. Accordingly, there is another solution of a less radical character, which seems to be more promising and better. Let these rules, which can be defended on theory, be followed, viz. : 1st, The domicile, and in the last resort the actual residence, of the ward decides where there is a question as to his nationality; 2nd, In a positive conflict of jurisdiction of this kind, where the one State claims the right of guardianship on the ground of nationality, the other on the ground of domicile, nationality decides; where there is a negative conflict of jurisdictions, arising from a difference of principle of that kind, between the systems of the two countries, the State of the domicile is bound to attend to the interests of the guardianship or curatory; 3rd, A guardianship or curatory, once set on foot, must be carried on until it is either taken over by a foreign State, or until some legal ground, sanctioned by the territorial law which is concerned in the matter, arises for giving up the guardianship or curatory.

NOTE P ON §§ 208-219. RECOGNITION OF FOREIGN GUARDIANS.

[The general principles of international law which regulate the recognition of the appointment and administration of foreign guardians are identical, whether the incapacity that gives rise to the guardianship is due to incomplete age, to mental weakness or disease, or (where that is a ground for curatory) to prodigality. These three kinds of incapacity may be considered together, since the incapax from any of the three causes falls into

⁹ I.e. according to the law of the Continent. The laws of England and the United States rest on different principles.

¹⁰ See Fiore, § 175, on this distinction, which he rejects. The curator in bankruptcy is affected by this principle.

¹ On conflicts of this kind, see J. ii. p. 380.

² Martin, J. vi. p. 132.

the same legal position, and the rules of law in different countries are, generally speaking, the same in all of the three cases.

The principle that the interest of the incapax is the first thing to be considered, has regulated the practice as to the appointment of guardians in America and continental countries, and has now been adopted in England also, except where real estate is concerned. Thus, in France a foreigner will not be excluded from the family council, nor from the office of tutor, merely because he is a foreigner, if he is otherwise suitable for the office (Dunn v. Dupuis, 1879, Trib. Civ. de Versailles, J. vi. p. 397); a foreign father may be appointed tutor to his son, who is a French subject, if that is most convenient for the interests of the child (Bonchy v. Antoine, Trib. de Briey, 1878, J. vi. p. 285); and a foreigner resident in Louisiana has been nominated to be the tutor of his children by the courts of that State (1874, Succession Guillemin, 2 A. 634). The Belgian courts have refused to appoint a foreigner to the office of tutory (Prince of Rheina-Welbeck v. Comte de Berlaimont, Trib. de Namur, 12th August 1872); but this decision is pronounced by the Reporter to be of doubtful soundness. The Scots courts have refused, on grounds of expediency, to appoint persons out of their jurisdiction to be tutors or curators, in applications in which they have, by reason of domicile, or the situs of real estate, a primary, or an exclusive jurisdiction. But they will recognise the appointments of foreign courts to such offices, where the incapax is properly subject to these courts, except where real estate forms the subject which is to be administered. "It is quite unnecessary that a fresh guardian should be appointed to manage personal estate, even when situated in another country. The case of heritage, of course, is different" (per Lord President Inglis in Sawyer v. Sloan, 1875. Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. iii. 271).

It is no doubt the influence of the maxim, that the interest of the incapax must be the leading consideration for the court, that has induced the courts of the Continent, in countries where nationality, and not domicile, is generally accepted as founding jurisdiction, to exercise a protective jurisdiction, ratione domicilii, in cases of incapacity, and appoint guardians to persons who are of foreign nationality, and have no more than a domicile, or it may be in some cases merely a residence, within the territory of the court. The French law allows a French citizen to change his domicile without changing his nationality, to the effect of submitting the tutory of his children to a foreign law. So, too, a Frenchwoman who has been married to a foreigner, but has, on her widowhood, returned to France and recovered her French nationality, may be appointed tutor to her children who are resident with her in France, although their nationality will be that of their father. The appointment is made by the French courts, and the rights and duties of the tutor on the one hand, and the security given to the wards on the other, over her estate, are those which the law of France allows. This decision bears to proceed upon considerations of social order and public morality (Sokolowski, Bourges, 1874, J. iii. p. 29). So, too, from similar considerations of the interests of the wards, in a case where the father of a family, himself a foreigner, was in jail in a foreign country, and his children, who were with their mother in France, had been left unprotected by her death, the French courts appointed a tutor to them, although no such step had been taken in their own country (De Nau, 1877, Trib. Civ. de la Seine, J. v. p. 275). The courts of Belgium will place a foreigner who is resident in Belgium under curatory as a prodigal. "The court extends to foreigners the benefit of all the laws that have in view the protection of person or of property" (Cour d'Appel de Bruxelles, 9th June 1873). This same jurisdiction, in a case of prodigality, has been exercised by the Italian courts (Dulché v. Pirola, 1872, J. iii. p. 213); and in the case of Stocker Kirkhope, decided by the Court of Appeal at Lucca, 1875, J. iii. p. 215, the court laid down that in cases of incapacity in persons who were domiciled or resident in Italy, there was jurisdiction in the Italian courts to assume the administration of the affairs of the incapax, but only if the courts of his own country could have exercised a similar jurisdiction in the circumstances that had occurred. In the case of interdiction on the ground of prodigality, the French courts have followed a similar rule, laying down that a process of interdiction will be allowed to proceed in France if it is just and advantageous for the interests of the incapax that it should do so (May v. Sheppards, Cour de Caen, 1873, J. iv. p. 145).

These were all cases where no competing appointment had been made for the protection of the incapax by the court of any other country, and they have been cited for the purpose of showing that the interests of the incapax are of such importance that the courts of the country where he is found will not hesitate to exercise a protective jurisdiction for his behoof. But on the Continent the status of guardianship, once validly constituted, will be recognised according to the lex domicilii, wherever the ward may go, or wherever his property may be, and no distinction will be taken between real and personal property. In Austria, for instance, the courts have refused to sanction a sale of real property situated there, belonging to minors who were of foreign nationality and domicile, and under a foreign guardianship. The necessary authority must be obtained from the court that is charged with their guardianship (Supreme Court of Austria, 1870, J. iii. p. 53). In the case of Willoughby, 1889 (J. xvii. p. 329), the Ct. of App. at Paris recognised the validity of an appointment by the courts of the country to which the ward belonged.

This same case of Willoughby had been under consideration in England, and in giving judgment on it, the judges laid down some broad principles which deserve to be noticed (1885, L. R. 30, Ch. D. p. 324). By that judgment it is expressly decided that it is to nationality, and not to domicile, that the English courts will look in considering whether they have jurisdiction or not. Mr Justice Kay there quotes with approval a dictum of Lord Cranworth in the case of Hope (1854, 4 D. M. and G. 344), to the effect that "the Sovereign as the parens patriæ is bound to look to the maintenance and education of all his subjects." Lord Justice Cotton, in delivering judgment, says: "The court has jurisdiction to appoint guardians in a proper case of any infant who is a British subject, wherever that infant may be residing, or whoever may have the custody of that infant abroad." In the case on hand, the child was born abroad; his paternal grandfather had been a natural born British subject; the infant was resident abroad with his mother; and he had no property in England. It was held that the court had unquestionably jurisdiction in respect of his British nationality, and the appointment was made.

The law of England and the law of America used, however, to hold that if any person incapax came within their jurisdiction their courts had power to take up the care of his person and the management of his affairs, although a foreign guardian had been already validly appointed. That they should have jurisdiction in cases of necessity to appoint, on the ground of residence, without requiring a full domicile, is reasonable, and is sanctioned by the principles of the continental decisions cited above, and the courts of Scotland would, in pressing cases, hardly hesitate to make such an appointment ad interim. But the law of Scotland always recognised, in so far as the custody of the person and the management of the personal estate were concerned, the appointment by a competent foreign court, without requiring any new appointment to be made or the old one to be confirmed. In England, however, and in America, the courts maintained their exclusive rights of jurisdiction over all such persons within their territory, and have exercised them in such cases as Johnstone v. Beattie, 1843, 10 Cl. and Fin. 42. But in more recent times the courts of England have receded from this extreme position, and their attitude as described by Mr Westlake is this: As regards the custody of the person of one incapax, he says (§ 7), "now at least the English court, in appointing a guardian or committee of the person, will support the authority of the guardian or committee existing under the personal law or jurisdiction, and not defeat it unless it should be abused," and refers to cases in point (cf. also Wharton, § 260 et seq.); as regards the estate, the foreign guardian can sue and give receipts for personal property belonging to his ward, and it will therefore seldom be necessary to appeal to the English courts to make a new appointment for such purposes.

In the case of Willoughby already cited, Lord Justice Cotton, in dealing with the case of a minor coming to England, says: "It would be wrong for the court to act in violation of the wishes of the guardian appointed by a court of a foreign nationality. It may, however, assist or enable the authority of the court to be carried into effect in this country." It would thus appear that the authority of the case of Johnstone v. Beattie is no longer binding, for the principle enunciated by Lord Justice Cotton is inconsistent with it. In the case of Stuart v. Stuart, a case relative to the custody and education of the Marquis of Bute (1860-1861, 4 Macq. 1861, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xxiii. p. 902), the House of Lords had already laid down doctrine of a similar character as to the respect to be paid to the title of a foreign guardian, and the duty of the court of the country in which the ward happens for the time to be, to assist the foreign guardian in recovering possession of his ward, or in carrying out any scheme of maintenance or education that the court which appointed the guardian has settled.

As we have pointed out, the courts of Scotland have always recognised the title of the foreign guardian, and would do what was necessary to give effect to it. With regard to the case of Johnstone v. Beattie, which for a time ruled the English practice, Lord Justice Clerk Inglis in Stuart's case (Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. vol. xxiii. p. 914) says "it involved a violation of the principles of international law, recognised in Scotland and all the States of the Continent of Europe, so direct and unequivocal, that I believe the very last thing that would ever enter into the mind of a Scots judge would be to follow the authority or adopt the principle of Johnstone v. Beattie."

The principle on which the English court claims jurisdiction over all subjects of the Queen as parens patriæ would, of course, equally authorise the Scots courts to deal with all British subjects. The principle has, however, never as yet been applied by the courts of Scotland, and the principle of domicile is that on which they base their jurisdiction. If the question should, however, arise, the authority of Willoughby's case seems as applicable to the powers of the one court as to the other. In cases of conflict of jurisdiction with the English courts, there is, of course, no room for the application of any other principle than that of domicile.

The courts of Scotland, in the case of lunatics as well as minors, will refuse to make any appointment in the face of one already made by a competent foreign court, to control the person or the personal property (cf. Fraser on Parent and Child, pp. 602 and 609), but a foreign interdiction on the ground of prodigality will not receive effect unless published in Scottish form (ibid. p. 588).

In England, as in America, where real property is in question, the appointment will be made by the court of the country, and the administration of that estate will be regulated by the law of the country where the real estate is situated: "There is no question whatsoever that, according to the doctrine of the common law, the rights of foreign guardians are not admitted over immoveable property situate in other countries. These rights are deemed to be strictly territorial, and are not recognised as having influence upon such property in other countries, whose systems of jurisprudence embrace different regulations and require different duties and arrangement" (Story, § 504; Westlake, § 166).

On the Continent, as the author states, the lex domicilii will regulate the guardianship over immoveables just as over moveables.

In Scotland the law is thus stated by Lord Fraser (p. 605): "The practice in Scotch courts has been for some time to appoint a special guardian to Scotch heritage belonging to foreign wards;" and the person so appointed will always be a Scotchman within the jurisdiction of the court. In special circumstances the courts have allowed a minor to nominate as his curator a person outwith their jurisdiction, taking all possible precautions and exacting undertakings that the curator shall, in the matters of the curatory, submit to their jurisdiction; but very special circumstances require to be shown. Contrast the cases of Lord Macdonald (1864, Ct. of Sess Reps. 3rd ser. ii. 1194), where it was sanctioned, and Fergusson (1870, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 3rd ser. viii. 426), where it was refused. "But in regard to the administration of guardians for lunatics, as well as that of guardians for minors, the question is yet undecided whether the lex domicilii will be recognised as the law to which the guardian is bound to conform in his dealings with property situated in Scotland," belonging to a ward having a foreign domicile (Fraser, Parent and Child, p. 609). There are indications that the lex domicilii of the ward would be held to regulate these (Lamb, 1858, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xx. 1323); but, on the other hand, it is difficult to suppose that an officer appointed by the courts of Scotland should have wider or narrower powers according as the ward was by domicile a foreigner of this or that country or domicile.

LAW OF THINGS.

I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

A. RIGHTS IN IMMOVEABLES.

GENERAL AGREEMENT TO RECOGNISE THE lex rei sitæ, BUT DIVERSITY OF OPINION AS TO THE FOUNDATION OF THIS RULE.

§ 220. No rule of private international law is less disputed than that which holds that real rights are to be determined by the law of the place where the property lies.¹ The difference of opinion in the modern Franco-Italian school is only apparent. For although it applies its general principle to the law of things as a whole, i.e. demands that the personal law of the parties should be applied, it limits, however, the operation or validity of this law by the provisions of the lex rei sitæ, in so far as public policy (ordre public or ordre public international, as the case may be) requires such limitation. It is easily seen that the second principle, which in name is merely a qualification or limitation of the other, completely ousts the other when we come to deal with particular cases, and indeed is the only principle left.²

We cannot, however, say that this concurrence of opinion extends to the grounds upon which the law of things is held to be determined by the lex rei sitæ. Most of the authorities assume that these things are subject to the lex rei sitæ as a matter of course, without troubling themselves to inquire further. Others again infer, from the conception of the sovereignty of every State, that none will permit the application of foreign laws to things that are situated in their territory.³ Savigny finds ground for the application of the lex rei sitæ by assuming a voluntary subjection of themselves thereto on the part of all who claim rights in these things.⁴

The supremacy of the lex rei sitæ is not per se obvious. We can, as may be seen from the earlier Middle Ages, imagine a state of affairs in which e.g. property will be transferred to the new owner, according to the personal law of the person who has hitherto held it: and where, for example, there is no particular territorial law to be applied, as in a country which is in course of being taken up by colonists of different nationalities, one must perforce have recourse to some personal law as regards the acquisition of real property. The sovereignty of a State is just as strictly applicable to persons who are temporarily within its dominions, as to things which happen to be there. There is therefore no speciality applicable to the law of things to be found in that direction; and, in any event, the result of the abstract principle of sovereignty, and the non-recognition of foreign laws, is the supremacy of the lex fori, and not that of the lex rei sitæ.

The voluntary subjection on which, according to Savigny, the application of the lex rei sitæ rests, is a petitio principii: on the one hand it must be shown that the laws recognised at the place where the thing is proposed, in his sketch for the revision of the Belgian Code Civ. § 13, to provide "les biens meubles et immeubles sont régis par la loi nationale de celui à qui ils appartiennent." But those who were in charge of the more recent bill for this purpose (Rev. xviii. p. 452) declared against this misleading provision. For, as they demonstrate, Laurent (cf. Avant-projet, p. 65), by help of his theory of the "reality" of the law of "social interest," finds his way back by a roundabout way to the application of the lex rei sitæ. In subsec. 1 of art. 5 of the new bill, it is simply and properly provided: "Les biens meubles et immeubles sont soumis à la loi du lieu de leur situation en ce qui concerne les droits réels dont ils peuvent être l'objet."

³ Merlin, Rép. Loi, § 5, cites the words of Portalis:—"La souveraineté est un droit à la fois réel et personnel. Conséquemment aucune partie du territoire ne peut être soustraite à l'administration du souverain comme aucune personne habitant le territoire ne peut être soustraite à sa surveillance et à son autorité. La souveraineté est indivisible. Elle cesserait de l'être si les portions d'une même territoire pouvaient être régies par des lois qui n'emaneraient pas du même souverain." Cf. Schäffner, p. 65: "The foreigner who wishes to exercise rights over immovable property in this country, enters the sphere of this country's law by that very fact. He makes claim to subjects which, by their very nature, can be under no other law than that of the State whose corporeal basis they do to some extent constitute."

situated will suffer no interference with their supremacy over rights connected with these things, for otherwise a voluntary subjection to them would not ensure the application of the lex rei sitæ; and, on the other hand, if it is true that anyone who wishes to exercise actual rights over a thing must betake himself to the place where it is situated, and may thereby be subjected to the laws of that country, it does not by any means follow that other States must recognise this subjection; if, for instance, a moveable thing be afterwards taken into the territory of another State, or if the question, who is the owner of a thing, should emerge incidentally in the course of a process in some other State as the foundation of a private right.

On the other hand, the following considerations seem to point to the recognition of the lex rei sitæ as the only course that can practically be carried out in the long run where intercourse is in some measure developed.

The law of things is commonly defined as the doctrine of the legal dominion of persons over things. This is not quite accurate, since all departments of law must at bottom regulate legal relations among persons, and things in themselves cannot stand in any legal relations to persons: we only express by this definition the negative side of the legal relations that fall under the subject—the proposition that if one who has the legal dominion over a thing deals with it somehow in the exercise of his dominion no legal relations arise, since it is at his command in the way in question.

The most important and the most difficult part of the doctrine of the law of things deals with the protection which he who has the dominion over a thing enjoys as against third parties who have no such right, as against the whole public, who may actually come into contact with the thing, and as against all other persons who have some right, but who must in this or that respect give way to the dominus, whose rights in the particular case on hand we are considering. It occurs to one at once that no doubt for a short period it will apparently be feasible to test all these legal relations by the law of one person, who undoubtedly at one time had the exclusive right to it. But when the holders of the property are frequently changed, and when you have to deal with a number of persons with different personal laws, all clothed with rights over the property within the same territory, general confusion must necessarily arise if such an attempt is made. Unless each particular article is accurately registered by authority, so as to certify its original ownership, it would soon be impossible for any one to ascertain with certainty what law should be employed to test the legal acquisition or legal loss of property, and even if it could be ascertained, the application of the personal law would be a fruitful source of frauds and difficulties for everyday commerce. If these complications would soon mount up, so as to be intolerable in the case of moveables, the supremacy of the personal law in the domains of real property law would result in this unfortunate position, that on the one hand every system of landholding adopted for some particular end⁵ would break down, because of the large number of properties which would be under the control of some other system, and the law of the land would only apply to the real property, which from the first has belonged in full ownership to subjects of the country. And how could courts of law decide such difficulties with any certainty or consistency?⁶ All this explains how the so-called system of personal law as ruling the law of things—at least in so far as immoveable property is concerned—could only prevail for a short time and with countless inconsistencies, and indeed could only maintain itself so long as men had no clear conception of real rights, but treated a real right on the same footing substantially as a personal claim against the possessor, from which the possessor could relieve himself by a simple or qualified oath, of an indefinite enough description, or by an appeal to combat. Again, since the recognition of the lex fori as such—i.e. in so far as the lex fori and the lex rei sitæ are not identical—is opposed, as we have formerly demonstrated, to the idea of an orderly system of private international law, all that is left is to recognise that the lex rei sitæ is the only law that can be applied in this subject. This follows not, as the popular belief generally goes, as a merely dialectical or merely logical necessity springing from our conception of the law of things or of territorial sovereignty, but as a real necessity, resting upon the intolerable inconvenience of any other doctrine.⁷

Besides, in speaking of the application of the personal law, one generally thinks not of the personal law of him who can so far be shown to have been the first owner, but of the personal law of him who is the owner at the moment. If, such being our conception of the matter, two persons with different personal laws dispute as to the ownership, an attempt to apply the personal law involves a circulus vitiosus. The personal law is to decide which is the owner, but this personal law is itself to depend upon the same question.⁸

⁵ Cf. Wharton, § 278. We cannot of course believe, without further enquiry, that, if some particular positive legal system or development of law has, as a matter of fact, led to certain results in political economy, these results were the moving cause in that development of the law. The exclusive rule of the lex rei sitæ was established in the sphere of real property law for a long time before any one had taken thought of any such results in political economy. We are not therefore to regard these as in truth the decisive considerations. We might from this deduce this false inference, that if two different legal systems could be shown to have the same economical results in view, we should not be required to adhere so closely, as in other cases we should, to the exclusive competency of the lex rei sitæ.

⁶ There could not possibly be any legal security in alienations of property. Wharton, § 284, notices this.

⁷ In my former edition I attempted a more dialectical proof, which approached that which has now been given. In any case, we see that Savigny's theory of "voluntary subjection" cannot be well founded.

⁸ Wächter, i. p. 293, and after him Savigny, § 366; Guthrie, pp. 178, 179, have used this argument.

PROPER LIMITATIONS TO THE DETERMINATION OF DISPUTED QUESTIONS
BY THE lex rei sitæ.

§ 221. Of course, we must not give the operation of the lex rei sitæ too wide a field of operation, as the older authors have not unfrequently done. The same error has to some extent been committed by French jurists, but it is becoming less and less frequent among them, whereas, on the other hand, it is found to a much greater extent in the English law, and the law of the United States. It is only those legal propositions which belong to the law of things, and the law of possession or property, that are to be extracted from the lex rei sitæ. But that law does not determine all the preliminary points, which in any particular case condition the acquisition or the loss of a real right for some particular person. If all these preliminary questions were to be so determined—e.g. whether a person had the capacity to alienate a landed estate—the result would be, either to make the whole personal law dependent on the law of the territory in which the property lies, or to distinguish, by help of a fiction, in one and the same actual person, who has different landed properties with different territorial laws applicable to each, different personalities in the legal sense. This is, no doubt, the system of the feudal law. One who received a subject in feu from an overlord, belonged in a sense to this overlord and his system of law in his person as well as in other senses, and so a vassal may have a different personal law in the court of his overlord and in the court of the country, or it may be a different law in each of several feudal courts. But where there is complete liberty of alienation of landed property this system is untenable, for such freedom requires that the powers of disposal in the person who acquires real property shall be independent of the territorial law of that property. That extensive operation of the lex rei sitæ, which we have seen is laid down by the laws of England and the United States in connection with the law of guardianship, is simply a mistake which has its origin in tradition. This error is in its turn most fiercely assailed by another erroneous theory, viz. that of the modern Franco-Italian school mentioned above. This theory withdraws all these preliminary questions forthwith from the determination of the lex rei sitæ, and only as an ultimate resort puts the question, how far the general result yielded by the personal law of the persons interested must yield to the lex rei sitæ. But if we keep in mind that upon the lex rei sitæ those legal propositions only which concern the law of things in abstracto should depend, and not those upon which the legal destiny of the thing in the concrete case depends⁹—whether,

⁹ It is therefore an inaccurate idea which we find older codes, e.g. the Austrian Statute Book, § 300; Code Civil, art. 3, providing that the thing, instead of the real rights in it and questions as to the possession of it, which is what they mean to say, are subject to the law of the place where the thing is situated. This erroneous conception is to be found in the 7th article of the Dispos. sulla public del Codice Italiano. On the other hand, the conception of the new Belgian bill cited in note 2 is sound. Still more accurate is the 10th section of the Saxon Statute Book: "Rights in moveables and immoveables, and also the possession of the same, shall be settled by the law of the place where they are situated."

for instance, the thing in the particular case belongs to A or to B; and if we further keep in mind that all rights which are connected with the law of things affect the indefinite body of the public, and so touch the public interest, it will be found quite unnecessary to take this roundabout course of referring the matter to the personal law. Besides, an enquiry as to the public interest is at times misleading, tempted as one is to form ideas of one kind or another of what that interest is, which are quite foreign to the subject.

But it by no means follows, from the exclusive application of the material law which is recognised at the place where the thing is, that it is necessary that the court of that place should be the only competent court. According to the older common law of Germany, the lex rei sitæ was recognised; but it was lawful e.g. for a man to bring a vindication at the domicile of the defender, and the judgment pronounced in foro domicilii was recognised at the place where the immoveable property was situated, unless it involved a determination which, by the law of that place, was absolutely inadmissible.^{10 11}

B. GENERAL PROPOSITIONS CONNECTED WITH RIGHTS IN MOVEABLES.

PRINCIPLE OF THE APPLICATION OF THE LAW OF THE PLACE OF RESIDENCE.

THE RULE "mobilia personam sequuntur."

§ 222. The reasons we have set out speak in favour of the application of the lex rei sitæ to real rights in moveables as well as in immoveables, and some of them more strongly in the former than in the latter case.

It must, therefore, appear all the more surprising that far the larger number of the older authors, and even many modern writers, especially English and French, take a distinction in this respect between moveables and immoveables, and lay down a rule, that while rights in immoveable property are to be determined by the lex rei sitæ, rights in moveables are to be determined by the lex domicilii of a person¹ (Mobilia ossibus inhaerent).

¹⁰ Wharton seems to lay this down, § 273.

¹¹ See, too, the ordinance for civil processes for the kingdom of Hannover, 1850, which is now displaced by the Civil processordnung for the empire. In Hannover at that time, and in part even still, very different laws of immoveable property were recognised in different parts of the country. The recognition of judgments pronounced in foro domicilii, even in real suits, has never been doubted. The American decisions cited by Wharton, § 276, are to this effect. [An action for the price of heritage may be brought at the domicile of the debtor (Girard Delorme v. Bergeron, Trib. civ. de la Seine, 1874, J. iii. p. 268).]

Most of them do not expressly say to what person they refer, but they mean the person of the owner.² The view that holds the domicile of the possessor as regulative—a view which is more easily carried out in practice, because the rules dealing with the possession of things are more generally alike among different peoples than those which determine property—is more rare.³

The reason assigned for this view is, that moveables must be held, in a legal sense, to be at the place where the person has his domicile,⁴ because it is quite accidental where they may be, and it is in the absolute power of the owner to take them from one place to another. (According to the theory of statuta personalia, realia, and mixta, it was assumed that the laws which dealt with rights in things were statuta realia, but as the laws recognised at the domicile of the owner were said to rule the case of rights in things, these laws were, for shortness, described as statuta personalia when they referred to moveable things.⁵) But even putting out of sight the impossibility of carrying out in practice the rule of determining rights in moveables according to the lex domicilii of one of the parties concerned, this ground cannot be considered as apposite, since the existence of a right is very often due to accident; while the provisions made by the owner or possessor for his property may be of little importance, since in the law of things the actings of third persons who, in a question with the good right of the owner, have no right at all in the thing, can often disturb or encroach upon the owner's rights. It is still less possible to lay stress upon the principle recently laid down, that the person acquires a power of attraction over the thing;⁶ by such means anything could be proved.⁷

If we enquire more closely what import the older authors mean to assign to the rule, we can scarcely find one instance adduced of a real right to a particular article as an illustration of the theory, although facts lay so near at hand. On the contrary, as a rule, they take the relations of the law of inheritance and of the property of married persons, cases in which the rule is applied in order to avoid the result that would ensue from the consistent determination of their problems by lex rei sitæ—viz. that a different law of inheritance or of matrimonial rights might apply

³ Haus, pp. 26, 34; Story, § 383; and Kierulff, specially declare themselves in favour of the rule of the law recognised at the domicile of the owner.

⁴ The older writers say, "Mobilia ossibus inhaerent," or "Mobilia personam sequuntur." English and American authors and courts say, "Personal property has no locality."

⁵ So, for instance, Fœlix, loc. cit.

⁶ Holzschuher, p. 63.

to each single moveable article that belonged to the estate. This result seemed so absurd and impracticable, that it was thought necessary to avoid it by the introduction of a special rule of law; and, as in these two departments of law, instead of laying stress upon the cardinal point—viz. whether and to what extent the different systems of law looked upon the estate as a whole,⁸ or upon each asset that belonged to it separately,—these departments were universally held to supply a separate class of rights in things, while the lex rei sitæ was declared to be supreme over rights in things as a general rule, the only way to extricate matters without a contradiction was to set up the fiction that moveables were to be held to be present at the domicile of the owner or the possessor without consideration of their actual situation. In these two categories the question that must inevitably arise in the application of any rule dealing with rights as to particular things—viz. whether the domicile that is to be taken shall be the domicile of the owner or other person who had the real right, or of the possessor—could not be raised. Since in any dispute as to inheritance or the property of married persons, all those who took part therein founded their rights upon a succession to the estate of one and the same person, or upon a right to represent one and the same person, it is only the domicile of this one person that can come into question; the suit as to the inheritance or the estate of the spouses will not touch the real rights of any other persons, apart from and independent of the rights of the deceased, or of either of the spouses. Some writers, again, who go so far as to determine the capacity to act by the lex rei sitæ, use the rule for the purpose of confining their theory, which, if applied to moveables, would lead to results that could not be carried out in practice, to the power of disposing of immoveables.⁹

This is confirmed by the many exceptions taken by authors of foresight. Mevius points to the case of an arrestment laid upon a moveable as a case where it would not be possible to apply the law of the domicile of the person to whom the thing arrested belonged,¹⁰ and J. Voet will only sanction the rule in the restricted sense of a practical regulation, and not of a legal principle, so that it would be necessary to inquire into the practicability of its application in every case.¹¹ Among the modern authors who defend the theory in general, Fœlix and Massé except from its operation the law of things in almost all its special applications.¹²

⁹ Cf. Unger, i. p. 156. The cases reported in §§ 3, 7, 9 et seq. of Story, in which the rule "Personal property has no locality," was taken by American and English courts as the basis of their judgments, appear without exception to refer to cases of succession or of property of married persons.

¹⁰ Proleg. qu. 4, § 27. If the rule were consistently carried out, arrestments, depending upon the fact of the owner and debtor being a foreigner, would be inconceivable, for no man is held to be a foreigner by the law of his domicile.

¹¹ Comm. ad. Dig. i. tit. 4, p. 2, Nos. 10-13.

¹² Massé, p. 96, No. 70; Fœlix, i. p. 134. Schäffner, p. 82, expresses himself to this effect.

Demolombe,¹³ Aubry and Rau,¹⁴ and also Brocher (i. § 48), lay it down that, in cases where a thing has to be considered as a single isolated object, the lex rei sitæ is the only law that can be applied. Fiore (§ 199) and Asser-Rivier pronounce against any difference in principle between moveable and immoveable things with the greatest emphasis,¹⁵ and Weiss (p. 754) notes that the theory "mobilia personam sequuntur" is more and more losing ground. In Germany, since the well-founded attacks of Wächter and Savigny,¹⁶ it may almost be said to be displaced. Westlake, too (p. 164, etc.), and Wharton¹⁷ declare in the most decided way against the theory, which is rejected by v. Martens.¹⁸

As regards legislation, the Austrian statute book still stands (§ 300)¹⁹ on the rule "mobilia personam sequuntur." The Italian statute book²⁰ is quite indistinct in its conceptions, it has reproduced the modern Franco-Italian theory in a way which is very ill-suited for legislation. On the other hand, so long ago as last century the Codex Maximilianeus Bavaricus i. in its 2nd and 17th sections pronounced distinctly against any difference being made between things moveable and immoveable, and the 10th

On the other hand, the rule "mobilia sequuntur personam" has lately found at the hands of Lorimer, i. p. 416, a defence which is more ingenious than apposite. Lorimer is, however right in treating with some ridicule Savigny's distinction of the different kinds of moveables.

²⁰ Disposiz. prelim. art. 7: "I beni mobili sono soggetti alle legge della nazione del proprietario, salvo le contrarie disposizioni della legge del paese nel quale se trovano." See on this Esperson, J. viii. p. 211. The Editor of the Journal takes his stand on the somewhat obscure theory (developed by Mancini in the reasons given for the statute) that in principal the personal law of the owner ought to decide, but must still give way to the lex rei sitæ, unless where it is in some "intimate relation" (Esperson) to the person of the owner.

section of the Saxon statute book makes a like declaration,²¹ as does also art. 5 of the new Belgian draft code.²² The Code Civil makes no special provision as to moveables.

But even in the territory of the Austrian Code it has at times been found necessary to allow some recognition to the lex rei sitæ: this has been forced upon the courts by the nature of the subject, by the contradictions which frequently were disclosed in decisions based exclusively on the law of the person. Thus, for instance, on 12th December 1876, the Supreme Court of Upper Austria held that an arrestment of a moveable article belonging to a foreigner must be tested by the law of Austria. Theorists, too, have given to § 28 of the introduction to the Prussian Allgem. Landr. viz.: "A man's moveable property shall be subject to the law of the jurisdiction to which he regularly and generally belongs, without regard to his place of residence at the time," the meaning that "property" is to be understood as "property as a whole." Accordingly, as Förster says, one has a free hand to determine rights in particular things by the common law of the land, and the lex rei sitæ is generally taken as the rule.

EXCEPTIONAL APPLICATION OF THE lex domicilii OF THE PERSON WHO HAS RIGHT TO THE THING (OR IS POSSESSOR OF IT) ACCORDING TO THE VIEWS OF SAVIGNY AND OTHERS.

§ 223. Savigny, however (§ 366, Guthrie, p. 179), believed that the validity of the lex rei sitæ could not be affirmed without certain concessions to the principle of the law of the domicile, and many eminent German authors have followed him in this view²³ in this or that application of it.

1st, In the first place, says Savigny, the position in locality of the moveable thing may be so indefinite and fluctuating as to exclude the possibility of knowing where that position is, and consequently what is the territory the local law of which applies, and to exclude, too, the assumption of a voluntary subjection to that law; to this class belong a traveller's luggage or goods in transit. 2nd, A moveable article may also be so dedicated that it becomes attached to some permanent resting-place, as, for instance, the stocking of an estate or the furniture of a house. 3rd, Between these two opposite classes of moveables there lie many intermediate cases in the most various gradations. The general rule of the supremacy of the lex rei sitæ will be applied to real rights in things of the second class, as is admitted by many authors, who in other respects take the rule "mobilia

²¹ "Rights in things moveable and immoveable, as well as the possession of them, will be tested by the law of the place in which they are."

²² The Zürich statute book, § 2, says: "In judging of rights in moveables also the situation of the thing for the time and its natural relation to the different local and provincial laws are to be taken into account."

²³ So particularly Stobbe, § 32, 11, and Dernburg, Pandekten, § 47 ad fin.

sequuntur personam " as their principle.²⁴ With regard to the former class to which belong the cases of a traveller with his baggage passing through several countries in one day in a mail coach or in a railway train, and that of a merchant despatching goods upon a long sea voyage, the lex domicilii will always rule. Savigny thinks it impossible to lay down a general rule for the intermediate class. It depends on circumstances whether the lex domicilii or rei sitæ is to rule; and it is not merely the longer or shorter stay of the thing in one place that is to be considered, but also the nature of the legal rule with the application of which we may be concerned. For example, a very short period will be sufficient to determine the question as to the appropriate form of alienation of the thing, e.g. whether it shall be tradition or mere contract, to the effect of making the lex rei sitæ the rule, whereas, on the other hand, as Savigny remarks, prescription may be considered in another light.

We can, however, only assent to these limitations to a very small extent. The very principle on which they rest, the principle of referring the application of the lex rei sitæ to the voluntary subjection of the parties to it, is unsound.

But, apart from that, we have the following criticisms to urge. The first exception, of which Savigny speaks, is only apparently an exception, and this deceptive appearance arises from a confusion of the will or intention of the parties with the form of the constitution or transference of a real right. If the acquisition of a real right in a thing rests upon a voluntary transference on the part of the owner, or of any other person who may have the right to it, the intention of the party making the transference (apart from the other requirements of the law in cases of transference or grant of such right) to make that transference or grant must be clear; and there may be a doubt as to this intention in case it should happen that the requirements for the constitution or transference of the right in question are different at the place of the domicile of the granter from those in use at the place at which the thing happens for the moment to be. If, then, as is assumed in the instance, given in illustration by Savigny, of the traveller's luggage, or the cargo upon a voyage, the owner does not know where the thing is, or what the law of the place is, his intention cannot be ascertained, if, in the transaction that is in question, the forms required by his lex domicilii, or by that of any other person having right to the thing, are not observed. As, however, the right in question cannot be transferred unless that intention exists, the alienation of the thing, although conceived in a form that is recognised as valid by the lex rei sitæ, will be ineffectual in such a case. For instance, take the case that, by the law of the domicile of a merchant who sends a cargo of goods through different countries, tradition is required to transfer property in moveables, but is not required by the law of the place which these goods at the moment of the contract happen to have reached upon their transit. If the question is raised, it cannot be asserted, so long as tradition has not taken place, that there was any intention of transferring the property.²⁵ That the thing has remained in any particular place for a shorter or for a longer time is in such cases important only with a view to ascertaining the intention of the contracting parties, and decides nothing as to the objective requirements for the transference or constitution of real rights. We cannot, therefore, by this enquiry into the intention of the contracting parties, which must always be matter of fact, set up a special rule of law applicable to a particular class of moveables. This error, in Savigny's case, runs in connection with his theory of a voluntary subjection, and thus indeed he expressly limits himself to cases in which the primary enquiry is as to the will of the parties, and in which, as we see, although the basis of his reasoning is wrong, the decision of the particular cases is undoubtedly right. Stobbe, however, and Dernburg, and perhaps even to a greater extent Fiore (§ 199), seem to reject the theory of voluntary subjection—being, in our opinion, so far well advised—and thus in their expositions Savigny's error appears in a more thorough and positive form. They are actually of opinion that, with regard to all rules of law which touch upon real rights, a strict separation must be made between things which are intended to remain at a particular place, and those which are meant to change their locality constantly, although they will always in the end return to some particular place. The locality which is to rule in their case is not the place in which they actually are, which is constantly changing, but the place from which they are sent out, and to which they return or will be brought back. In this class of things railway trains and steamboats are to be counted, and a commercial traveller's portmanteau must be governed by the same rule. But why not also his watch, his coat, and his trousers? Why not, also, the milk-van, or the hand-barrow, which is used to carry provisions over the frontier of two countries? and why not a private carriage, with its horses, if the owner is in the habit of making daily journeys across the frontier? In such cases the purposes of the possessor or the proprietor with reference to the article may undergo a change. If the fur cloak or overcoat which the traveller used to wear on his journeys is degraded to being a dressing-gown, it is at once brought under the lex rei sitæ, and if some clever furrier or tailor makes it fit to go on its travels again, it must once more be subjected to an entirely different treatment in the eye of the law. If the travelling cloak is stolen, the owner must vindicate it according to the rules of his lex domicilii; if his dressing-gown is stolen and carried by the thief into another territory, and has to be vindicated there against a third party in whose possession it is, this third party may appeal to the limits placed upon the right of vindication by the law of the place in which the thing now is. It is obvious that such distinctions are impossible to accept as legal doctrines,²⁶

²⁵ A similar observation must be made in reference to the rule "locus regit actum."

and that it would be better to accept the old rule "mobilis personam sequuntur" in its full breadth.

And what is the result of treating a real right in a moveable thing by the rules of the personal law of the possessor? In truth we are landed in a kind of extra-territoriality, or, at least, we must in a fashion personify these things, if they are to be either altogether released from the operation of the law of the territory to which they belong, or at least are to be invested in some measure with the personal law of a country in which they are supposed to have their home, this personal law operating beyond its own territory. Now that is a legal possibility, but only in the case of things, which as a matter of fact in virtue of their size and importance have a kind of recognisable individuality, e.g. seagoing ships and the larger kinds of river ships.²⁷ The former are in the positive legislation of the world treated on a different footing from the great mass of other moveables, and the Institute of International Law, as we shall again have occasion to mention, recommended not long ago that the law of their home port should be applied to them. We may, too, notice that from the point of view of existing law, a ship is in the eye of public law, while it is on the open sea, held to be a part of that territory whose flag it is entitled to carry; and that therefore, on this ground, if the owner has placed his goods upon a ship belonging to his own country, the lex rei sitæ and domicilii coincide until the ship has reached a port of some other country.

§ 224. Savigny's doctrine, that the character of the legal rules which it is proposed to apply must be taken into consideration, is much more sound. There are, in fact, rules of law which in their very nature postulate a permanent subjection of the thing to some particular territorial law. To this class belong the legal rules as to prescription positive and negative. In connection with these doctrines, it is impossible to look upon the lex rei sitæ as furnishing the exclusive rule with regard to moveables. Who shall say in how many different territories any moveable subject you like to select has been during the years of prescription, and if it were proposed to allow the prescriptive period settled by each system of law to have a certain proportional effect, how could it be exactly ascertained how long the stay in each different territory endured? Here we are another character. The distinction made by the statute book of the Argentine Republic (art. 10 and 11) is perhaps sounder and more practically useful; everything that serves for the personal use of the owner is subject to his lex domicilii. (Paper by Daireaux, J. xiii. p. 295.) Böhlau, § 74 (note 621), is of opinion that luggage, etc., is not subject to the lex rei sitæ at every point of a journey, but only at a halting-place. But how long must the halt be?

perforce driven to the law of the domicile of the possessor.²⁸ This can be done without falling into a circulus vitiosus, because in such cases the fact of possession will be quite certain, and because the possessor²⁹ has it in his power at any moment to take the thing to his own domicile, while that domicile is the centre of all his legal relations with his property. If, however, in an exceptional case the possessor allowed the thing to remain, during the whole period which could be of importance in the particular case, within a territory where a law different from that of his own domicile prevailed—take e.g. the case of a valuable collection of pictures owned by a rich man in some country house beyond the limits of his own country—in such a case it would be proper to allow the primary rule, the application of the lex rei sitæ, to come into play. The result then comes to this: the lex domicilii of the possessor gives the rule in the case of these doctrines of law. The possessor may, however, if it is to his advantage that the lex rei sitæ should rule, show that the thing has remained uninterruptedly in the territory of the lex rei sitæ for the whole time of the prescription which is required by the law of the lex rei sitæ.

We must not, again, in this connection attempt to set the national law of the possessor in place of the law of his domicile, although we are of opinion that it is nationality that fixes personal law. We are dealing here simply with a presumption of fact. The question we put is—Where may we suppose that the possessor has enjoyed his possession, or, if this possession is exercised in different places, where may this possession be said to have had, as a matter of fact, a kind of centre? The same circumstances are involved in this question as in matters of jurisdiction, as we shall see again in another connection. Jurisdiction is, as a rule, not determined by nationality, but by actual domicile.

If the possessor has changed his place of domicile within the period of time applicable to the case, we may reckon the time proportionally to his different domiciles.³⁰ (So soon as the possessor shifts his domicile to a territory by the laws of which no prescription, negative or positive, would

³⁰ Thus, if a thing is brought out of one country (e.g. France, Code Civ. 2279), where the period of prescription as regards moveables is three years, into another in which the period is two years (e.g. Italy, Codice Civ. 2146): two years in France then = $\frac{2}{3}$ of two years in Italy = $\frac{12 \cdot 2 \cdot 2}{3}$ months = 16 months: the possessor must add eight months of possession in Italy to the two years possession in France, in order to be able to appeal to the provisions of the law of prescription. But see Windscheid, Pandekten, § 32, note 10, as to the calculation when there has been a change of the law applicable to the negative or positive prescription.

in the circumstances run, prescription must necessarily cease for the time.) It would be possible, too—and perhaps this would be simpler and juster—to test the right of the possessor by that one of the two systems of law which is more favourable to him. The operation of the law of the later domicile can of course only begin from the time at which this domicile is acquired.³¹

APPLICATION OF THE lex rei sitæ, IN CASES IN WHICH THE MOVEABLE ARTICLE CHANGES ITS LOCALITY. PREFERENCE GIVEN TO THE LAW OF THE PLACE WHERE IT HAS LAST BEEN.

§ 225. We have already noticed (p. 79 et seq.) that every person, like every thing, must primarily be subject to the law of the place in which he or it is at the time, to the law, that is, of the last situation, which he or it happened to have at the time the legal process was instituted. But this proposition is of less importance in the sphere of the law of persons and the law of obligations. This is so, on the one hand, because of the wide recognition by foreign States of other personal laws. It is so, again, because any man's obligation, be it by contract or by delict, permits the existence of an indefinite and unlimited series of further obligations, which in themselves need never come into collision, or, at the utmost, may come into collision with each other, if the obligant has not in fact the means of discharging all his obligations. One and the same person may, as regards one obligation, be subject or may have subjected himself to this local law, and to that local law as regards another obligation. But with the law of things it is otherwise. It is not possible for different laws to rule the same thing at the same time. Thus it is that the law in whose territory the thing happens to be at the time, or, as we may say, with a view to the decision in some process that is to be or has been instituted, the law in whose territory the thing last was, will be supreme. But its rule is not, be it observed, altogether exclusive. In the abstract it is possible that it might reign alone, to the exclusion of all other territorial laws, and by itself dispose of the thing. But considerations of the security of international trade and intercourse interpose. The legal destinies of the thing, which have been impressed on it at some earlier period, are respected, in so far as they do not conflict with the operation of the law of the territory where it now is; the law of that territory, to further the unconditional security of all acquisitions of property within its own limits, must give effect unconditionally to the operation of its own rules, without respect to any legal destiny that may have been impressed on the thing at an earlier date. (A judgment of the old Supreme Court of Jena³² very soundly lays down that, in general, a right acquired in accordance with the law of one State does not cease to operate, by the thing being brought into another State, by the laws of which that right in the thing would not have been acquired, but that the objective import, i.e. the exercise of this right, can only be applied in questions with third parties, or can only be maintained in so far as that is permitted by the law of the place where the thing then is.) If, for instance, the law of the subsequent situation of the thing³³ recognises no security rights in moveables without possession, a right of pledge acquired on other conditions in another State, without any change of possession, cannot be allowed any effect in a question with a third party, who is in possession of it in the country where it is, or in questions of bankruptcy.

³¹ The law assigns the thing to the possessor who is domiciled within its own territory under certain conditions that are to be fulfilled in the future, without regarding the question where the possessor may subsequently have his domicile.

If it is demonstrated that it is the theory of the legislature, so far as concerns the law of things, that it shall in certain relations deal with all things that are at any moment within its own territory, it would no doubt be conceivable that the State, while claiming this right for itself, giving the like right to other States, at least in relation to things which belong to their subjects, should provide that rights in things which belong to one of its own subjects, or were acquired in its own territory, should only be lost even in another country by processes known to its own law; and that the rights of others in those things should only there be recognised, if they were acquired in accordance with the law of the domicile of these persons. This would, however, be a denial of the principles on which the whole of modern private international law rests (see supra, p. 82). Civilised States allow trade and commerce, and allow moveables to be taken from one territory into another, and they concede to each other this much in addition, that these things shall be subject to the legal system of the State into whose territory they are by any means brought. What monstrous uncertainty for commerce would arise, if one State were not bound to recognise the acquisition and the loss of real rights in things which have taken place within the territory of another State in accordance with its system of law, may be imagined. All the less can we fall in with the theory of a voluntary subjection of the parties assumed by Savigny; taken up strictly, it would lead to this result, that the application of the lex rei sitæ must cease, if the thing in question had been brought against the will of the possessor into the territory of another legal system.^{34 35}

³³ Savigny (§ 368, Guthrie, p. 191), who did not see clearly the length to which the preference to be given to the place where the thing last was reached, arrives, no doubt, at substantially the same results in the cases we are here considering, but on grounds which are unsound, and in certain circumstances would be misleading. Besides, he fails to see that we are here really concerned with a principle, and not with a mere isolated exception from the application of the lex rei sitæ. See on this subject below.

³⁵ In maritime warfare the belligerent powers recognise that a ship, which has really fallen into the enemy's hands, belongs to the enemy and is subject to his system of law, and that, if it be again taken from the enemy, the right of the former owner does not revive, the "reprise" falls to the "reprenneur." Grotius, iii. c. 6, § 3, No. 1; Massé, i. § 417; Vattel, iii. § 195.

FORMULATION OF THE RESULTS OF OUR ENQUIRY.

§ 226. All this discussion, if summarised, yields these propositions for the law of moveables :—

First, Real rights³⁶ are to be tested by the law of the place where the thing in question was at the time the act or the fact, by which the right in question is said to be affected, took place.

Second, If a moveable thing falls under some right of property or possession within the territory of another law, then all rights, including rights of possession in the thing which existed before that date, are extinguished in so far as they would be in conflict with that subsequent relation of property or possession. This latter relation claims absolute effect.^{37 38}

³⁶ The provisions of two ordinances of Bremen, of 25th Aug. 1848, to which Stobbe, § 32, note 15, directs attention, are peculiar. According to these enactments, which deal with the acquisition of property and with the right of pledge in moveables, they are to be applied to property if the person who has acquired right is a citizen of Bremen, and to a right of pledge if the pledger is a citizen, even although the contract or the delivery of the subject, or the constitution of the right of pledge, as the case might be, did not take place within the territory of Bremen. These provisions become explicable, if we remember that in the former law the point which it is really desired to deal with is that the pactum reservati domini shall have no operation, while in the latter the object is, apart from isolated exceptions, to deny effect to any kind of pledge but pledge by way of actual delivery. Such enactments acquire practical importance particularly in bankruptcy and in processes or diligences of that character, and the place of acquisition of the right matters not, if the things are afterwards brought into the territory of Bremen. The provisions are not, however, altogether correct.

³⁷ I made various applications of this proposition in my first edition. I, however, thought that it was reasonable to formulate it anew in connection with the first proposition. See the commentary on subsec. 3 of art. 5 of the new Belgian Code (Rev. xviii. p. 452): "Lorsque, à raison du changement survenu dans la situation des biens meubles, il y a conflit de législation, la loi de la situation plus récente est appliquée," and the important decision of the Supreme Ct. of the German Empire of 26th April 1872 (Seuffert, xxviii. § 2). See, too, the grounds of judgment of the English Ct. of Exchequer [Cammell v. Sewell, 1860, 29, L. J. Ex. p. 350] cited by Piggot, p. 251, viz. "if personal property is disposed of in a manner binding according to the law of the country where it is, that disposition is binding everywhere." In truth, the question in every case is simply as to the application of this rule for conflicts where, as the expression goes, the law of the place where the thing subsequently is, does not recognise the right which took its origin at the place where it was at an earlier date (see Sup. Ct. at Berlin, 1875, Seuffert, xxxi. No. 194; Trib. Comm. Cannes, 27th July 1874, J. ii. p. 436. French law formerly recognised no securities over ships). The right of the possessor or the creditors in a bankruptcy comes into collision with a right which had been acquired at an earlier date.

³⁸ As Laurent, viii. § 245, and Weiss, p. 768, point out, the following important result affecting the international operation of the well-known rule of the Code Civ. § 2279 (see, too, Codice Ital. art. 707), "en fait de meubles possession vaut titre," will arise. A man who acquires a thing, supposing it not to be stolen or lost, is protected against vindication at the hands of the former owner, not merely by a bona fide acquisition which has taken place in France, the former owner being e.g. a person who had acquired the thing within the territory of the common law of Rome, say in the town of Hannover; he is also protected, if he acquires the thing in the territory of the common law of Rome, and has subsequently brought it to France; he becomes in that case full owner. That would be sound, if the 2279th article did not, by implication and according to its historical origin, lay weight on the acquisition of the thing within the territory of the law of France. The literal reading of the section allows another construction. The fact

Third, In so far as we have to deal with rules of law, the application of which implies a protracted subjection of the moveable thing to the territorial law, the law which prevails at the domicile of the possessor has to be applied. But we must still adhere to the ordinary rule of the application of the law of the place where the thing is, if it is shown that the thing has really been at some particular place uninterruptedly for the necessary length of time. If the possessor has changed his domicile, the law which is more favourable to the possessor is in the first case decisive: but the effects of the law of a subsequent domicile cannot be allowed to be taken into account until the time when that subsequent domicile is acquired.³⁹

C. INAPPLICABILITY OF THE RULE "locus regit actum" TO THE LAW OF THINGS GENERALLY.

NECESSITY FOR OBSERVING THE FORMS OF THE PLACE WHERE THE THING IS, EVEN IN THE CASE OF MOVEABLES. CONTRACTS AS TO THINGS in transitu.

§ 227. The rule "locus regit actum" has no application to the law of things.¹

One proof of that is the general demonstration which we have already given, that the lex rei sitæ should be applied to the exclusion of all other laws in connection with the law of things. The application of the lex loci actus is allowed out of favour to the contracting parties, or to parties making some declaration. They cannot, at their own pleasure, subject themselves to any forms they please in entering on their legal transaction. But indirectly, it is in the end their good pleasure, or at least their individual habits and manner of life, to which the validity of the transaction done in accordance with the lex loci actus is to be referred, for, to that possession is exercised for a moment in France, can certainly not be enough. If it were, a man who has bona fide acquired a thing in the territory of the common law of Rome, but is apprehensive of a vindication being brought against him, would only require to take the thing for a moment over the French frontier, in order to have a good defence against the vindication even in his own country. This result seems somewhat serious, too much calculated to provoke open evasion of the law.

³⁹ Many authors apply in this case the rule, which rests upon a circle, that rights well acquired are to be defended. According to the conception of the general principle which we have adopted, it is obvious that things, which a man has acquired in some other country, do not cease to be his property by being taken into the territory of another law, where the acquisition of property is possible only under other conditions than those which are necessary in the country where he acquired it. For the acquisition of property must be tested by the law of the place where the thing actually was at the time of the transaction by which it was acquired, and not by the law of any other place to which it may subsequently be taken.

give rise to its application, they betake themselves to some particular place, or reside at some particular place. But, in the law of things, questions arise also as to the effect upon indefinite or unknown third parties: they cannot be deprived by the contracting parties of the protection, which is guaranteed to them by the special forms for transferring the right recognised at the place in which it is situated. Confidence in these would be completely broken up, if a residence in another country, of which third parties need know nothing, were to release the contracting parties from the necessity of observing the lex rei sitæ. Even so simple a form, and one that offers so little protection as traditio of the thing, still under certain circumstances provides a measure of security against the simultaneous acquisition of it by others, or against fraudulent antedating of the transference, not to speak of the requirements of public instruments, or of registration in public books.

That the rule "locus regit actum" is not applicable to the law of immovable property, may be proved with considerable certainty by a reference to history.

In the Middle Ages, to acquire landed estate in property or in feu was held equivalent to being received into the community or feudal union under whose authority that estate lay. This explains how, at first, such rights had to be transferred in presence of the community, and afterwards before the judex rei sitæ,² and thus the application of the lex loci actus was necessarily excluded. Although this rule disappeared in many districts as the Roman law advanced, yet the rule of customary law, "locus regit actum," was never applied to real rights to landed estate.³

³ This, too, is undisputed. For instance, we may name the following authors who specially reject the rule "locus regit actum" as regards the acquisition of landed property and other real rights in the soil: Argentræus, No. 3; P. Voet, c. i. § 9, No. 2; Alef, No. 44; Cocceji, vii. 14; Ziegler, Dicastice, Cond. 15, No. 12; Boullenois, i. pp. 501-503; Reinhardt, i. 1, p. 31; Mittermaier, § 32; Burge, ii. pp. 843-871; Wächter, ii. p. 383; Story, §§ 435, 363; Savigny, § 381; Guthrie, p. 320; Unger, p. 176. Although Story, in the passages cited by him, § 439, finds a large number of authors who take the opposite view, the reason of that is that these authors—viz. Rodenburg, tit. 2, c. 3; Vinnius, ad Instit. 2, 10, § 14, No. 5; Molinæus, Consilia, 53, § 9; Huberus, i. tit. 3, § 15; J. Voet, ad Dig. i. tit. 4, p. 2, §§ 13, 15—discuss the validity of a testament executed according to the forms of the lex loci actus to affect immovables situated elsewhere; and that this question must, no doubt, be answered in the affirmative as regards those territorial laws where there is an universal succession, and the immediate right to the real estate is not considered as the subject of the disposition; while, according to English law, from which Story starts, the notion of an universal succession has no application to immovables, and therefore there is no distinction between the acquisition of a landed property by testament and acquisition by a conveyance inter vivos, so far as the question of form goes. In spite of other recognitions of the rule "locus regit actum," all the German State treaties given by Krug make an exception of rights of real property, and subject them to the lex rei sitæ. Krug, pp. 50, 51. See, too, Laurent, vii. §§ 287, 294; Stobbe, § 32, note 7; Förster, Eccius, § 11, note 22; Duguít, Forme, p. 102; Asser-Rivier, § 41 (pp. 90, 91); Wharton, § 275; Weiss, p. 765. (According to modern French law, property can only be transferred inter vivos by "transcription." Judgment of the Supreme Court of Spain, 21st Jan. 1871 (Torres Campos, p. 287.) "According to the principles of private international law, the effect of contracts which directly touch real property is regulated by the real statute.")

In so far, however, as public instruments are necessary for the transference of real rights in immoveables, these may, according to the general rule, be executed in a foreign country, and then as regards their form the rule "locus regit actum" will apply.⁴

More modern German doctrine⁵ inclines more and more decidedly to the conviction that the form of the transference of real rights, even in moveables, must be exclusively determined according to the lex rei sitæ at the date of the transference. But Westlake and, with special emphasis, Wharton,⁶ and similarly v. Martens, are also all upon this side. It seems as though the majority of the Franco-Belgico-Italian school were of the same mind.⁷ [The law of Scotland is to the same effect, for it was held so long ago as 1868 (Connal & Co. v. Loder and others, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 3rd ser. vi. p. 1095) that the question whether the right in certain pig-iron was or was not carried by the mere indorsation of the iron warrants, must be settled by the law of Scotland, the iron being actually in Scotland, and not by the law of England, in which the indorsation took place.]

THE INTENTION OF THE PARTIES TO BE CONSIDERED.

§ 228. Of course, in the case of a contract from which it is said that a real right is to arise, the intention of the parties must be directed to that end. There may be a doubt about that intention, or it may miscarry altogether, if the parties enter on the legal transaction in a country in which some special form is required for the constitution of a real right, and do not observe that form.⁸

⁴ Cf. Duguit, Forme, p. 107. It is a legislative error to provide in § 2128 of the Code Civ. that a deed dealing with a security over a piece of French real property cannot be executed in another country. Cf. Duguit ut cit.

⁵ Cf. Savigny, § 366; Guthrie, p. 178; Schmid, p. 60; Stobbe, § 32, note 15; Förster, Eccius, i. § 11, note 23. A moveable thing which happens to be in the territory of the common law of Rome, or of the Prussian Allgem. Landr., only becomes the property of a buyer when the traditio, which these systems require, has taken place, even although two Frenchmen conclude a bargain about it on French territory. See judgment of the Supreme Court at Munich, 9th May 1868 (Seuffert, xxiii. § 103); Sup. Imperial Court of Commerce, 5th Sept. 1873 (Entsch. xi. § 7); C. Brussels, 9th Aug. 1876 (Transference of property by bill of lading), Rev. viii. p. 497. Judgment of the Sup. Ct. of the Empire (v.), 6th June 1884 (Blum. Annal. ii. No. 207, p. 440), with reference to the Russo-German Consular treaty. As the judgment notices, this treaty modifies the application of the rule "locus regit actum," by giving consuls the power of officiating as persons who can execute legal instruments, but the rule "locus regit actum" is to have no application to the constitution of such rights in moveables.

Are we not, however, to make an exception at least in the case where the thing is in transitu, and it is unknown at the moment where it is?⁹ This question must be answered in the negative. This is a necessary result, if we remember that a third party, e.g. by arresting the thing, may have acquired rights over it, and these rights, acquired as they were in conformity with the lex rei sitæ, can never be denied effect because the other contracting parties were not aware of them. But it is not so difficult as it is supposed to be to find the solution which will be satisfactory in practice. The bargain between the two contracting parties, which to begin with constitutes a mere obligation, acquires effect as a real contract the moment the thing reaches a territory in which the form which the contracting parties have adopted is sufficient for the constitution of the real right. It will, therefore, as a rule be sufficient if the parties observe the law which is recognised at the place¹⁰ to which the wares are consigned.¹¹

ing parties should have any special intention as to employing permissive or dispositive rules of law in order that they should come into operation; it is sufficient that they should by implication have had such intention, or even should have had it in their minds. But, in the cases we are here concerned with, the transmission of the property according to the law of the contract is not a matter of permissive or dispositive law, while by the law of the place where the thing is, a bargain is required according to which the transference of the property is ipso facto legally complete.

¹⁰ But the intention of the parties, in order that it may have effect in conformity with the law of the place to which the goods are consigned, must subsist up to the moment at which the thing reaches the territory of that country. That is substantially the foundation of an interesting judgment of Lord-Chancellor Selborne, of 7th Nov. 1873 (J. i. p. 200. Ex parte Cote, L. R. 9, Ch. App. p. 27), although the grounds of the decision are put on a different ratio. The plaintiff had posted a letter in France with bills addressed to a person domiciled in England. Before the letter had started news was brought by telegram that the person to whom the letter was addressed had failed. The rules of the French post-office allow a person sending letters to get them back before the mail is despatched, under certain formalities. The writer of the letter observed these formalities, but in consequence of an oversight of the officers of the post-office, the letter was nevertheless sent off and was delivered. In England a letter cannot be got back from the post-office: the post-office authorities regard themselves as mandatories of the receiver. The bills, however, were allowed to be vindicated by the Lord Chancellor's judgment. "The intention of the parties, and the acts done by them, are more important than the omission of the precise form in which their intention ought to have been expressed."

Dudley Field, § 573, is inexact in saying, "property in shipping is governed in respect to the title thereto, the modes of transfer . . . between living persons by the law of the nationality of the vessel." The decisions which he himself cites seem not to bear out that statement. A judgment of the Imperial Court (i.) of 1st October 1887 (Bolze, Praxis, i. § 30, p. 8) is more interesting, and, in my view, is altogether apposite. The pursuer, who lived in Vienna, had sold meal to some one in Frankfurt O.M., and had despatched it from Vienna. The Court held that the question whether the property passed to the defender when the goods were handed in to the carrier's office at Vienna must be determined by the law of Austria. If

But the contract, in so far as its real operation is concerned, will be checked, in so far as a third person has already acquired a real right which comes into conflict with it, that real right being acquired in accordance with the lex rei sitæ. We cannot, therefore, think it necessary to set up any special legal rules for things which are said to be subject to a constant change of place in their nature: any such rules would simply give rise to confusion.¹²

We must, besides, remember that a contract which had for its object the constitution of a real right, but failed to effect that object because the forms of the lex rei sitæ were not observed, may very often constitute a binding covenant to grant the real right that is in question.¹³ This obligatory contract would have to be upheld in accordance with the rule "locus regit actum,"¹⁴ and would give a right of action to compel the constituit were found that the property had passed, but on condition always that the goods should not be rejected as disconform to contract—to the effect of rescinding the transmission of the right of property, as if it had never taken place, the moment that rejection was legally made, or was accepted by the seller as so effected—the question whether the rejection had been validly effected in Frankfurt was a question for the law of Frankfurt.

¹² From what has been said, it follows, too, that a hypothecation or arrestment executed on the demand of a foreign judge cannot give any higher rights than belong to it by the lex rei sitæ. It cannot give the rights which would be created according to the law of the judge who makes the demand. The law of the judge is to some extent in the same position as the contract executed in another country (cf. decision of the German Imperial Court (iii.) of 20th Oct. 1882, Entsch. viii. § 28, p. 113). [See, too, judgment of the Scots Court in Donaldson v. Ord (5th July 1855, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 2nd ser. xvii. 1053), in which it was held that, when funds had been arrested in Scotland, any other diligence professing to compete with that arrestment must satisfy the conditions required by the lex rei sitæ, the law of Scotland. "In what way," says the Lord Justice Clerk (p. 1096), "can funds in Scotland be attached except under the law of Scotland?" But see below note on § 275.]

¹³ The points for consideration are—(1) Whether the parties intended, at least in the long run, to enter into a binding contract; (2) whether they have observed the form which is recognised at the place where the transaction was entered into, or some form that will settle the question of intention. The former must be ascertained on a consideration of the circumstances of the particular case, and is not at once to be assumed, especially in the case of contracts which are without consideration. Burge, i. p. 24, ii. p. 865; Story, § 436; P. Voet, de stat. c. 1, § 9, No. 2; Burgundus, i. 15, 16, 37; Rodenburg, ii. c. 5, § 9; Wächter, ii. p. 383, note 181. By the Hannoverian Ordinance of 18th December 1843, § 3, it is required in several provinces that contracts, by which it is intended to secure, divide, transfer, or discharge full or limited rights of property, or rights of succession over real property, should, to be formally valid, be executed in the form of public documents. In my opinion a contract concluded abroad without complying with that formality does not transfer the real right. On the other hand, we are not to apply the provision of § 6, which requires, for the constitution of a binding obligation for the transference of any of the real rights mentioned, a private document signed by both parties, to contracts of this kind concluded abroad, if we have plain evidence that the mind of the parties is directed to the constitution of a binding contract. See judgment of the Appeal Ct. of Geldern, 6th May 1856 (Hingst, Rev. xiii. p. 410).

tion of the real right.¹⁵ [This is the doctrine of the law of Scotland. See Erskine, iii. 2. 40.]

D. WHAT LAW DETERMINES THE CHARACTER OF A THING, WHETHER IT IS MOVEABLE OR IMMOVEABLE?

§ 229. The distinction of moveable and immoveable things is more important for the law of each particular State, than for private international law. Sometimes, however, as these territorial laws draw different boundary lines between moveables and immoveables, it is important to consider which territorial law decides the question whether a thing, or a right, as the case may be, is to be viewed as immoveable or moveable.

That question is to be determined on the following considerations. The assertion that a particular thing, or a particular right, is to be treated as moveable or immoveable, is simply a shorthand form of asserting that a number of legal propositions should be applied to the one or the other, i.e. all the propositions which are applicable to other moveables, or to other immoveables, as the case may be. The question, then, finds an answer so soon as we know what territorial law it is that is to rule the thing or the right, even although there shall be in that law no special provision as to their quality—whether they are moveables or immoveables.

The result is, then, that as regards things which have a material existence, in so far as the question is one as to rights that are directly real, the actual place where they are will decide;¹ but as regards other rights, the territorial law which rules these rights in other respects will rule this question also.² We must not forget that the division into moveables and immoveables is frequently of importance merely for certain legal categories,

The Prussian Allgem. Landr. i. 5, § 115, however, contains this general provision: "In all cases where immoveable things, or the property, possession, or enjoyment of these, is the subject of a contract, the forms required by the law of the place where the thing is must be observed."

The lex rei sitæ controls even the material provisions of obligatory contracts of this kind as to land and houses, and may therefore exclude the rule "locus regit actum." Cf. Stobbe, § 32, note 7, and Roth, Bayer. Privatr. § 17, note 81.

That is not, however, to be assumed, even although the object of the prescribed form shall be "to do away with abuses that have occurred in connection with alienations of property." At least I cannot concur in the ratio of the judgment of the Supreme Ct. at Mannheim, of 1st February 1866, reported in Seuffert, xxiv. No. 204. (The rule "locus regit actum" was in that case, as it has been more recently by Laurent, restricted to the form of the public instrument and not extended, as it should be, to the question whether any such instrument was necessary.)

² According to Boullenois, i. pp. 358, 360-364, the lex domicilii of the deceased rules in this question, in so far as the right of succession is concerned. Bouhier, cap. 29, § 41, takes and its operation as confined to these categories, e.g. the law of the property of married persons, or the law of succession to a certain extent.³ In these cases we have to deal with a proposition of matrimonial or of succession law, expressed in short form, and thus the system that regulates generally the law of marriage, or the law of succession, will give the rule.⁴ In this way we explain the divergent views of authors on the subject. For instance, if this question arises as to the acquisition of a right to rents by way of succession, then, if there is, according to the provisions of the legal systems in question, an universal succession, the personal law of the person in right thereof, whose succession is in question, prevails; as the lex rei sitæ does, in case succession to immoveables is held to be a singular succession by the laws recognised at the domicile of the ancestor, or by that which rules at the place where the thing is. If, on the other hand, the question is as to the effect of an assignation as against the debtor in a bond, then the personal law of the debtor will rule, in cases in which the assignation is, with a view to his protection, made to depend upon the observance of the forms that the domicile of the spouses as regulative of all matters connected with the communio bonorum of married persons, in so far as the rights of third persons are not touched. Christianæus (vol. i. decis. 252, § 7) takes the lex domicilii creditoris as his fundamental principle, if the legal relation in question concerns "favorem et utilitatem ipsius creditoris vel eorum qui ex ejus capite causam et successionem asserunt." General answers are attempted by Rodenburg, tit. 2, No. 1; Burgundus, ii. No. 29; Dumoulin, in vet. Consuet. Paris. § 11, No. 10, No. 28; Burge, ii. p. 78; Story, § 447; Demangeat (note to Fœlix, i. p. 137, § 64); Beseler, i. p. 154; Renaud, i. § 42, p. 106; Roth. Bayer. Privatr. § 17, note 72; Asser-Rivier, § 45; Weiss, p. 764. These writers propose to regard the lex rei sitæ only. Fœlix involves himself in a contradiction; in § 64 the lex domicilii is to decide universally, in § 61 the lex rei sitæ.

³ So express enactment of the Frankfurter Reformation, ii. 3, §§ 1, 2; on similar cases in the law of England, see Westlake, §§ 157, 158; Wharton, § 287 ad fin.

⁴ E.g. if by the law of matrimonial property prevailing at the domicile of the spouses, immoveables are excepted from the communio bonorum, while claims secured on dispositions of real property, rents, etc., count among immoveables. [In questions of taxation the actual situs will rule. C. de Cass. 1887, J. xvi. 827.]

[In the case of Monteith v. Monteith's Trs. 1882 (Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. ix. 982), it was held that, in a question of succession to a deceased Scotsman, whose personal estate was subject to a claim of legitim at the instance of his children, sums secured over English land by mortgage, which are, by the law of England, personal property, must have their character fixed by that English law, were therefore moveable, and so subject to the children's claim. This determination was arrived at on the authority of Newlands v. Chalmers Trs. 1832 (Ct. of Sess. Reps. 1st ser. xi. p. 65), and Downie v. Downie's Trs. 1866 (Ct. of Sess. Reps. 3rd ser. iv. p. 1067). In the latter case, Lord President Inglis says: "The principle has been recognised and settled that the character of a subject as heritable or moveable depends on the law of the country where it is placed." This character of moveable property was therefore held to attach to money so secured, and it was held to come into the Scots succession with that character impressed on it, the speciality as to the form of the investment being altogether thrown out of account. Lord Young, however, in Monteith's case, dissented, on the ground that this succession, being succession to a Scotsman, must be ruled by the law of Scotland, that by that law children have no such claim over money secured upon land, money so secured being, for this purpose, by the law of Scotland distinguished from other moveable property. This latter view seems more in accordance with the doctrine in the text; his lordship's reasoning may be thus summarised: The question of the quality of the asset must be determined by the law which, in other respects, governs the succession; all moveable succession is regulated by the law of domicile of the deceased (or, as the author would say, moveables are massed together to form an universal succession); this succession is moveable whether you look to Scots or to regulate the conveyance of real rights in immoveables.⁵ By the bankruptcy statute of the German Empire, § 39, subsec. 2, the character, e.g. of a thing or a right as immoveable, will depend on whether the law of the place, in which the thing happens to be, provides as a step legal execution against these things and these rights, the right of public sale, which is applicable to other moveable property, and has nothing to do with the consideration whether these things are counted as immoveable in any other relation.⁶

E. PERSONAL CAPACITY TO ACQUIRE RIGHTS IN THINGS.

§ 230. The personal capacity to acquire particular things, or rights in them, a question which in practice only comes up for consideration in connection with real property, is to be determined, not by the personal law of the individual concerned, but by the lex rei sitæ.¹ On this point a general consensus of opinion prevails. After what we have said in regard to legal capacity generally, this proposition requires no further investigation. Those, however, who take no distinction between capacity to have rights, and capacity to act, can only justify it by having recourse to "ordre public," to what they term the coercitive, politico-economical, or moral character of the rules of law that deal with the capacity to acquire and to possess.² But, if we go strictly to work, we shall, by following this abomination, as we may call it, of politico-economy or morality, and applying, not the lex rei sitæ, but the lex fori, a result which is obviously a mistake.³

F. PARTICULAR LEGAL RELATIONS.

1. POSSESSION.

§ 231. That the possession of a thing, and the possession of a right in a thing, must be determined by the lex rei sitæ, scarcely admits of doubt,

English law; therefore it is ruled by the Scots law of succession, and that law says that children shall have no such claims over money so secured, moveable though it be. Its character of moveable succession brings it within the scope of Scots law, but, once in the grasp of that law, it will be given out to the successors whom Scots law calls to it.

As regards the matrimonial law, it was settled by the cases of Chalmers and Downie already quoted, that while you will determine the respective rights of the spouses in property falling to them by the law of their domicile, you will go to the lex rei sitæ to ascertain what the character of the property is. E.g. you will enquire whether bonds bearing interest, left by a testator who died domiciled in Jamaica, are by that law, i.e. the law of England, heritable or moveable, and if they are moveable, they will, by the law of Scotland, fall into the communio bonorum of spouses domiciled in Scotland, to one of whom they have come by succession.

In the case of Egerton v. Forbes, 27th Nov. 1812, F. C. the Court of Session held that the question whether certain moveable funds, investments in English stocks, to which no title had been made up, vested or did not vest in a child of the owner by mere survivorship, must be determined by the lex rei sitæ, i.e. the law of England. But once vested in that child by that law, they would pass jure mariti to the child's husband, a domiciled Scot, agreeably to the law of Scotland, although the law of Scotland would have held that they had not vested.]

⁶ See particularly v. Völderndorff, Die Concursordn. für das Deutsche, R. 2nd ed. § 39, note 8.

³ According to what we have said, the lex rei sitæ, and it alone, will decide as to the capacity of juristic persons, e.g. religious foundations (the dead hand) to acquire property: the even when the thing in question is moveable.¹ The foundation of possession is the physical control of the thing, and that can only be exercised where the thing is.² It would lead to insoluble contradictions, if in private international law possession and property were to be dealt with on different principles. The following remarks are all that need be made :—

1st, As Savigny suggests, the questions as to whether recompense is due, and if so, what recompense and what penalties can be enforced by private persons for illegal encroachment upon their possession, are to be determined by that law which is applicable to relations of obligation arising from delict or quasi delict.

2nd, A legal proposition or rule which deals with the rights that arise from permanent possession cannot, as we have already said, be applied to things which are only found temporarily in the territory of a State.

In my former edition I applied this rule not merely to prescription, but to the rights that a possessor might have to the produce of a thing, and to his rights in respect of expenditure upon it. It seems more correct, however, to allow these latter questions to be determined by the law of the place in which the thing actually was when the possession began.³

One practical advantage of this course is that any other rule would necessitate enquiries and calculations, which would be always difficult, and sometimes impossible to carry out. But it is also sound on principle, because the circumstances under which any man has acquired, e.g. bought, will give his whole conduct its characteristic complexion. It may reasonably be expected that an honest man will not buy, if he thinks that the seller is not entitled to sell. But it would be unreasonable to ask a man who has honestly acquired anything, and who subsequently becomes aware of circumstances which create a doubt as to the legality of his possession, to offer the thing of his own accord, to avoid the disadvantages of dishonest possession, to the person who is entitled to it, or to seek out this person at great trouble and expense. In the same way, then, the law under which a man has acquired possession, must determine the character of that possession, unless, as the local situation of the thing is changed, new facts come into play, which, by the local law of the place in which the thing is same holds with regard to the capacity of foreigners to do so. Judgment of the Sup. Ct. of App. at Cassel, 3rd September 1836 (Heusser Annalen, ii. p. 752): "The laws of Prussia (the law of the person's home) cannot give the rule, if the capacity to acquire property in Hesse is limited to certain classes of persons."

¹ The right of the possessor is simply a transitory right in the thing, or, in other words, the right of actual de facto connection with it. Both doctrines, that of possession and that of right in the thing, are much involved one with the other, and, more closely considered, the one cannot be thought of without the other, as we may see from the ordinary definitions of the two terms. The definition of property as legal dominion or mastery is only intelligible by means of the correlative idea which must form itself alongside the former, viz. actual de facto dominion or mastery, and so, conversely, the definition of possession as actual dominion is only thinkable by the help of the contract with the notion of legal dominion.

² Savigny, § 368 ; Guthrie, p. 193 ; Burge, iii. p. 126 ; Unger, i. p. 175.

found after its change of situation, effect some change (e.g. unless this latter law gives some special effects to the fact of the institution of an action). Of course, in so far as the lex fori imposes certain prestations upon the possessor as consequences of the institution of the action, the pursuer can require no more under this head than what that lex fori awards him.⁴

3rd, Special restrictions often arise as regards the competency of possessory actions. The French "Code de procédure civile" contains, for instance, this provision (art. 23): "Les actions possessoires ne sont recevables, qu'autant qu'elles auront été formées dans l'année du trouble par ceux qui, depuis une année au moins, étaient en possession paisible par eux ou les leurs, à titre non précaire." We must separate the enactment merely referring to procedure from that material enactment which touches the right of possession; this article provides: 1st (and this is a material provision as to the law of possession), That a right of possession, unless the possession has lasted for a year, cannot be vindicated by action. This applies only to things situated in France, but to them without exception. 2nd (and this is a mere rule of process), That unprofitable suits as to possession of shorter duration are to be avoided—a provision that applies to all suits brought before French courts for the possession even of things that are situated abroad. If, in obedience to this rule of process, a suit for possession of a thing situated abroad be thrown out, it does not bar an action for the same end in the country where the thing is, if the laws of that place do not require the same length of possession, unless the judgment in France specially bears that the pursuer had no possession at all.

2. PROPERTY.

§ 232. The capacity of a person to have property is, as we see, to be determined by the lex rei sitæ, as being a part of his general capacity to have rights. On the other hand, the capacity to dispose of the property, in so far as the question is a question of the protection of the person concerned, is subject even in the case of real property to the personal law, as being a question of capacity to act. The divergent view of this point⁵ taken by the law of England and of the United States, which apply in such matters the lex rei sitæ, cannot be justified in argument. It makes a confusion inter alia between the capacity to dispose of property inter vivos and mortis causa.⁶ The application of the lex rei sitæ in the latter case can be defended on the principles of the law of England and of the United States, but it cannot be defended in the former case.

§ 233. In like manner the *lex rei sitæ*⁷ must determine questions as to the capacity of a thing to become the subject of private ownership;⁸ and

⁵ Story, § 431; Wharton, § 296. In England, however, this mistaken theory seems to be somewhat shaken. Cf. Westlake Holtzendorff, cap iii, § 2, p. 51.

⁶ See the law of succession on this subject.

⁷ See Stobbe, § 32, p. 1, on the circumstances in which this rule is applicable.

also whether that which has no owner becomes the property of him "qui occupat;" that which is newly constructed the property of him who constructed it; or that which is found the property of the finder.^{9 10} It also rules the question as to whether the thing can be alienated (except in so far as the prohibition of alienation is confined to particular persons), and questions as to reductions of sales by certain privileged persons.

The will of the parties may in some measure be considered as giving the rule for determining the question whether one thing is to be regarded as the pertinent of another or not: to this extent the law which determines questions as to the intention of parties, e.g. that local law under which the bargain affecting the thing falls, has to be applied. Apart from this, however, no law but the law of the place in which the thing claimed as a pertinent actually is, can decide: this must hold in the case of moveables as well as in the case of real property. The essence of the notion of a thing as a pertinent is simply the application of a rule of law that it to a certain extent must follow the legal fate of the principal thing. This rule is a real rule, in so far as third persons are affected by it, and therefore, in so far as it does not yield to the will of the parties, it is necessarily dependent on the lex rei sitæ.¹¹

Confiscation, too, which has taken place in conformity with the lex rei sitæ, must be recognised by a foreign State, without regard to the reason for which it was carried out.¹² It may be, for instance, failure to ⁹ Savigny, § 367; Guthrie, p. 183; so, too, the question whether a treasure-trove becomes the property of the finder or of the public treasury.

¹⁰ The Prussian Allgemeines Land Recht, i. 9, §§ 299-303, 315-323, 304-306, makes considerable deviations from the doctrine of the Roman law as to the requisites for acquiring property by specification (Koch, Preussisches Privatr. i. § 251). It cannot be doubted that if a thing is sold in a place by the laws of which it becomes, under the existing circumstances, the property of the buyer, irrespective of whether the seller was owner or not—for instance, if it is sold in the open market, or in an open shop—this acquisition of property must be recognised even by the State to which the real owner belongs, although there may be no such law in existence there. [So L.J.C. Moncrieff and Lord Craighill in Todd v. Armour, 1882, Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. ix. p. 901.] The question, too, whether by the union of a moveable thing with real estate property in the first is lost or become irrecoverable (cf. e.g. Code Civ. 554), must be determined by the lex rei sitæ. Cf. Laurent, vii. § 259; Durand, § 196, p. 407; and Weiss, p. 769; starting from the view that the only question here is as to the private interests of different proprietors, and that "Ordre public" is not concerned, arrive at untenable results, which imperil all legal intercourse. From the point of view of a quasi contract I reach again the lex rei sitæ.

¹² The public treasury may vindicate in a foreign country goods which were imported contrary to regulations, and are liable to seizure and confiscation (Hert, iv. 18). It is another question whether the State has a right or a duty to carry into operation a sentence of confiscation pronounced by another State. Cf. infra, § 146.

pay State duties. Everything that is brought into the territory of any State lies under its protection and the power of the laws there recognised.

Conversely, however, confiscation can only receive effect as regards things situated in the territory of the State itself.¹³ So if, at the date of the judgment imposing the penalty of confiscation, the thing in question is not in the country, then, in spite of that judgment, any alienation by the possessor remains good, and must be recognised even by the State whose officers have decreed the confiscation of the property. If anything shall have been adjudged to the person who found it, this mode of acquisition must also be recognised in a foreign country.

In accordance, however, with the rule already laid down as to the decisive weight to be given to the law of the last place where the thing was, the question whether a moveable thing can or can not be alienated, must always be answered by the law of the place in which it last was.¹⁴

In the same way the lex rei sitæ will rule the law of compulsory acquisition of property for public purposes, and will prescribe the statutory limits of ownership: e.g. the limits of that right as regards the erection of manufactories, or those that are necessitated by the requirements of mining statutes, or involved in a statutory prohibition of subdivision. In like manner limitation of the right of property in the interest of neighbours, of adjoining properties, and of upper or inferior heritors, are all dependent on the lex rei sitæ.¹⁵ It is plain that rules of that kind have no bearing upon things that lie beyond the territory, and that they would completely miss their mark, if any privileges in connection with them were to be given to foreigners who happened to own property in this country.

¹³ So Bartolus in L. 1, C. de S. Trin. No. 51; Chassenæus Comment. in Consuet. Burgund. Rubr. ii. tit. des Confiscations, No. 11; Mevius, proleg. qu. 6, § 14; Petr. Peckius, de Testament. iv. c. 8, § 8; Bouhier, chap. 34, No. 28; Ricci, p. 553; Casarejis, disc. 43, No. 17; Danz, i. § 53, p. 179. Wharton, § 383. This rule has a special application in the case of maritime war. The condemnation of a ship by a prize court transfers the property, in so far as the ship at the date of the condemnation was in the power of the State to which the court belonged. Of course, the decision must not offend openly the principles of international law. See reports of the decisions of English courts on this point in Piggott, pp. 252-264. Although the older writers make an exception in the case of confiscation imposed in terms of the jus commune, this is explained by the idea which prevailed in the Middle Ages, and frequently comes into notice in later times, that the Roman law was de jure good all over the world, and all other systems were mere deviations by statute from it. They do not, even in that case, claim the confiscated property for the sovereign whose courts have imposed it, but for him who is supreme at the place where the thing is situated.

¹⁴ It was thus lately determined in a very interesting case by the Trib. Civ. Seine, of 17th April 1885, that a vase which belonged to a Spanish Church, and which by the law of Spain was inalienable, had become alienable in France (J. xiii. p. 593). To the same effect Weiss, p. 768, note 2. Of course, the personal responsibility of the person who alienates the property illegally is not affected.

¹⁵ In these cases the locality of that piece of real property, against which an appeal is made to the limitation, must decide. The limitation cannot, however, be invoked in favour of any estate, by whose own territorial law a similar prohibition would not be recognised, since limitations of that kind rest on considerations of mutual convenience and comfort. See judgment of the Sup. Ct. of App. at Kiel, of 4th Sept. 1849 (Seuffert, vii. § 2), the grounds of which go still further: "An estate which is not governed by the law of Lübeck can no more have duties cast on it by that law than it can have rights conferred on it."

§ 234. The lex rei sitæ will exclusively govern the form of the transference of property, as we have already shown. Some other law may very well have to be taken into account to determine the import or meaning of the contract of transference, although that will not very frequently be so. But statutory provisions which limit freedom of contract, in the interest of the security of third parties, are to be recognised in accordance with the lex rei sitæ. An instance is the provision that rights of redemption or re-purchase shall not be capable of enforcement, so as to affect third parties, beyond a specified period (cf. Code Civil, § 1660).¹⁶ According to the principles here assumed, it is a necessary result that, if property has once been validly acquired by the laws of the place where, at the time of the conveyance, the thing was, then that acquisition is not thereafter rendered invalid by the removal of the thing to another place. According to Savigny's principle, which holds the place of the thing as the locality of all its legal relations, it is impossible in strictness to protect rights which have been acquired in any other way than by the rule that vested rights shall be respected—a rule already condemned by him.

The acquisition of property by prescriptive possession is plainly connected closely with the prescription of actions for the vindication of property; the latter, so far as moveables are concerned, cannot properly be discussed in this connection just at present. The prescription of moveables can only be determined by the lex rei sitæ;¹⁷ this is the universal opinion of the jurists,¹⁸ and must obviously follow from the principles we have laid down. If, however, the law of the place where the property is gives minors privileges, by which any estate belonging to them cannot be made the subject of prescriptive possession in the ordinary way, then, no doubt, we are to assume that a law of the kind is meant to be for the advantage of all persons who, by reason of their minority, are under guardianship, and therefore, even of those who, being resident abroad, are minors there, although by the lex rei sitæ they would be of full age.¹⁹

ACTIONS RELATING TO PROPERTY.

§ 235. Questions as to actions relating to property present more difficulties, and a very careful investigation is of importance on this head, both because there is so much difference among the different systems of law as to the duties and obligations of the possessor as against an owner vindicating his property, and because special restrictions with regard to moveables have often been introduced in the interest of commercial security in general. Very many of these rules, which seem merely to affect the process for the acquisition of the legal right, are truly, as Savigny remarks,²⁰ part of the legal right or relation itself. In strict accuracy, an action for property is nothing but the right of property under the special shape which the judicial claim requires it to take. The consequence is that, as the right itself is subject to the lex rei sitæ, so is the action, and the law that prevails at the seat of the court only steps in to regulate the duties of the parties in so far as these are mere matters of procedure.

The distinction which exists between the nature of moveables and immoveables is nowhere seen so clearly in operation as in the Rei Vindicatio and actions of the same kind. In the meanwhile, we shall first consider the simpler case of immoveables.

The lex rei sitæ is the rule not merely as to the essentials of an action claiming property, or any action on the same model founded upon some particular kind of possession (e.g. the Actio Publiciana of Roman law), but also determines the obligation of the possessor to keep the subject of the action scatheless, or to answer for its loss; to account for the increase and not to part with it fraudulently; and at the same time the right which he has to demand reimbursement of his expenditure on it, and to enforce this by detention; to take certain of the increase for himself, or to demand repayment of the price he paid for the property. This view derives special support from the consideration that, if possession and the rights arising from it are to be determined by the lex rei sitæ, the view which assumes this, but makes the lex fori decide the questions we have suggested, falls into a self-contradiction; for if the possessor, for instance, has a right to consume the increase before the action is raised, or before any mala fides arises, without being bound to make reparation, the result is that the pursuer can have no claim to it.²¹ According to the view which takes the lex fori as regulative, the pursuer will have a dangerous option in his hands, assuming that a real action can be brought in the forum rei sitæ and in the forum domicilii of the possessor as well.

An action for damages, or for the value of the article vindicated, against a person who, to prevent the success of a claim made against another, maliciously, and in spite of having no right of possession in the thing, throws himself into the action (liti se obtulit), is a pure question of a fine for a matter of procedure arising quasi ex delicto, and consequently to be determined by the lex fori. But it is different with the obligation of him qui dolo desinit possidere, in so far as his possession was given up before litis-contestation.²² We find confirmation of the latter statement in the fact that, by the general theory of the Middle Ages, the forum rei sitæ constituted an exclusive jurisdiction, and in more modern systems has been retained, especially in State treaties for insuring mutual legal remedies.²³ If, therefore, an action shall be raised in some other court than that where the thing is situated (which is quite exceptional), all the less can we assume that the law recognised at the seat of that court are to have any effect upon the material relations of the possessor who is sued.²⁴

²⁰ § 361, pp. 146, 147, of Guthrie.

LIMITATIONS ON THE VINDICATION OF MOVEABLES IN PARTICULAR.

§ 236. With the vindication of moveables it is quite the reverse. The possessor can take these from one place to another at pleasure, and the stay of any article in any particular place seems, as a rule, to be merely accidental and temporary. Therefore, without any regard being had to the temporary stay of the thing in another place, the forum domicilii is always recognised and considered as regulative.²⁵

This circumstance is recognised in the interpretation of the law as to the vindication of moveables to this extent, that all limitations of the vindication introduced for behoof of the possessor, and not those alone which belong to a permanent relation of possession, are applicable in all real actions for delivery of moveables raised in foro domicilii. Laws of this kind, which limit the right of vindication, mean to say something like this, viz.: "We shall protect the defender, in so far as the institution of the ²⁴ It is the natural result of this reasoning that the lex rei sitæ determines the prescription of actions in the case of immoveables. As a rule, too, it will coincide with the prescriptive acquisition. Yet some—as, for instance, Story, §§ 576 and 582—although they would determine prescription for the purposes of acquisition by the lex rei sitæ, would have the lex fori rule the case of negative prescription. Yet, since by English law actiones in rem, which have to do with immoveables, can only be brought in foro rei sitæ, this view in its result coincides with that taken by us, in so far as English and American tribunals are concerned—Story, § 581 ad fin.

²⁵ Even according to Roman law in its modern form, the forum rei sitæ is to be limited to such moveables as are to remain in some particular place, according to the intention of the possessor, either expressed or reasonably to be inferred, and therefore cannot be extended to goods upon a journey or ships put into port. It is only of things of the first kind that it can be said they are "res in aliquo loco constitutæ." It cannot be said of the latter kind, and that is the test demanded by L. 3, C. ubi in rem actio, 3, 19, the passage by which the forum rei sitæ was introduced. (Nov. 69, c. 1, applies only to the forum delicti commissi, and under this fall cases of disturbance of possession.)

action in our courts was not entirely accidental or capricious: we shall thus indirectly protect the importation of goods into the country, for, as a rule, the possessor will bring the things he has in possession to his domicile." E.g. the rule, "possession is nine points of the law," must be applied in the forum domicilii, although the thing claimed may be temporarily situated in some other country where this rule is not in force.²⁶ But, besides these limitations, the possessor may also appeal to those limitations of the right of action which are inseparably involved in the acquisition of the possession according to the laws of the place where it was acquired.²⁷ (Such rights often appear in the form of limitations of the right of action, by way of regulations as to procedure; e.g. "Things sold in open market are not, as a rule, subject to vindication." If one has bought an article in open market abroad, where this rule is in force, he may appeal to it in foro domicilii, or in any other jurisdiction, although there is no such limitation to be found there.)²⁸ [This rule has been recognised in Scotland in the case of Todd v. Armour, 1882 (Ct. of Sess. Reps. 4th ser. ix. p. 901), where it was held that a horse bought in open market in Ireland, where sale in open market cures the vitium of a theft, could not be vindicated in Scotland by the true owner, albeit the law of Scotland attributes no such efficacy to the sale in open market.] That is in consequence of the rule given above (§ 226, 1) as of universal application in the law of ²⁶ We may no doubt reach a different result if we go back to the historical origin of this limitation of vindication, and try to determine its international validity by reference to its origin. There was no action at all in older German law for recovery of moveables, and if an attempt to recover them was associated with an averment that possession had been lost by delict, the place where the delict was committed, i.e. the law of the place where possession was lost, would decide. But it is no longer possible, now that the idea of the vindication of property has become general, and, on the other hand, the idea of protecting a bona fide possessor in his possession has been introduced, to go back to that historical origin with a view to establish a rule for the international treatment of the legal propositions on this subject.

²⁸ The notion that such limitations upon the right of action as, "Hand muss hand wahren," i.e. "possession is nine points of the law," or, "You must look for your credit where you left it," are given to the possessor of the thing claimed as material rights, is confirmed by the shape which these rules—belonging originally to German law, and arising from the peculiar shape which the process in such cases assumed—have taken in modern systems of legislation, where they bind the bona fide possessor to restore the thing only upon payment of the price he himself gave, or assign him the right of possession altogether. (Cf. Prussian A.L.R. i. 15, § 25: "If any person comes into possession of a thing that has been lost by the proper owner or possessor, through an onerous bargain with a person who is not open to suspicion, he must restore it." § 26: "He may, however, on the other hand, claim in return all that he gave for it." Austrian Statute-Book, § 367: "There is no action against a bona fide possessor of a moveable thing if he can show that he came into possession of it either at a public auction, or from a tradesman dealing in things of that kind, or paid a price for it to any one to whom the pursuer himself had intrusted it for use, or for custody, or for any other purpose. In these cases, the bona fide possessor has acquired the property of the thing.") The object of such restrictions upon vindication is the special security of the traffic of the country where they exist. They things. This rule is the only one that can be applied, too, if the action for recovery of the thing happens purely by accident to be in foro domicilii—i.e. if the thing itself is intended to remain permanently in some particular place (res in aliquo loco constituta, L. 3; C. ubi in rem actio, 3, 19). It is also the only possible rule in cases where the possessor cannot appeal to the restrictions imposed upon such actions by the laws of his domicile—when, without any voluntary prorogation, or any jurisdiction given revindicatione, the real action for delivery of the moveable article can be, and as a matter of fact is, brought in foro rei sitæ. In such cases he cannot appeal to the limitations of the lex domicilii, because the plea that a vindicatio is, as a rule, brought in foro domicilii, and that, therefore, these limitations must have place, is rejected by the lex fori; but if the lex fori makes provision for the conflict of territorial laws, the judge must follow its instructions (e.g. if a thing is stolen from a person in country A, where it is competent, as in the common law of Rome, to bring a vindicatio of any moveable against any third party who may be in possession of it, an action may be brought in country A while the thing is still there, as in the forum rei sitæ, without the necessity of any voluntary prorogation or jurisdiction revindicatione; and if this is done, the possessor cannot appeal to such limitations of the vindication as are recognised only in his domicile and not in country A).

On the other hand, the defender cannot avail himself of any such limitations of the right of action, if they are not recognised either at the place where the thing was acquired, or at the place of his domicile, although they may be recognised at the place of action. The rule, that under certain circumstances it is incompetent to vindicate moveables, does not comprehend, therefore, all moveable things which are subject to commerce in that country—i.e. everything the possession of which is acquired in any such way in that territory. Allgem. deutsch. Gesetz, vi. § 306: "If goods or any moveables are sold or transferred by a merchant in the course of his business, the person who honestly acquires them acquires the property of them, although the seller was not owner. Property rights of an earlier date are extinguished. All rights of pledge or other real rights which were constituted at an earlier date are extinguished, if the person acquiring the thing was ignorant of them when he acquired it."

"If goods or other moveables are pledged and delivered by a merchant in the course of business, a right of property or any other real right of an earlier date in these things cannot be pleaded to the prejudice of the bona fide holder of the pledge, or those deriving right from him."

"This article has no application if the things were stolen or lost."

These provisions are so expressed as to protect the person who acquires such things, only where they were acquired within the territory, and not in cases where the acquisition took place abroad, while the action is brought in the territory, the defender belonging to that territory. The right thus acquired, which in substance is full enough, is limited in the area of its operation by the failure to limit the right of action in the statute. It may be doubted whether the provision of the Code Civil, § 2279, "En fait de meubles, la possession vaut titre," has any more extensive operation, at least in so far as the thing may have been brought into a territory subject to the law of France after the person who claims it has lost possession; see supra, § 226, note 37. See C. de Bruxelles, 9th Aug. 1876 (Dubois, Rev. viii. p. 497): The rule, which in the general case excludes vindication of moveables in Belgium, releases cargoes, which have been secretly withdrawn from an arrestment in another country, and are subsequently sold in Belgium, from all the effects of that arrestment.

mean that the law will hold such an action, if it be raised, as inadmissible on grounds of morality or public interest, as an actio injuriarum æstimatoria is declared inadmissible because no one should allow his honour to be salved with money; the simple object of limiting the right of vindication is the security of the bona fide possessor of a thing that does not belong to him, and can in reason only be applied to things that have been the object of legal commerce in the country, or are in the occupation of a person who is domiciled there.²⁹

The view now taken by us will in many cases give results in conformity with that which takes the lex fori as its groundwork,³⁰ for actions for delivery of moveables are as a rule brought in foro domicilii. It differs from it, however, in so far as it assigns no weight to the purely accidental circumstance what court may be competent, in consequence, perhaps, of the right of revindication, or by a voluntary prorogation of jurisdiction; and it also avoids the contradiction that takes place when the lex fori as such is expressly applied, viz. that the rights of the pursuer and the possessor, which stand in indissoluble connection with each other, should be determined by different laws, the former by the lex fori, the latter by the lex domicilii or the lex rei sitæ.³¹

The rules which we have thus worked out must of course be applied to the case of vindication of documents conferring rights on the bearer of them, although with certain modifications resulting from the fact that these documents are at the same time vehicles for relations of obligation. We reserve the discussion of this subject for our chapter on commercial law.

PRESCRIPTION OF MOVEABLES.

§ 237. We have already (§ 223) touched upon the prescription of moveables, and maintained that, as a general rule, the lex domicilii of the possessor must give the rule.³² We may again point out that prescription and the limitation of actions for recovery of property must necessarily be subject to the same law, but we must examine the theories which are opposed to our own somewhat more closely.

According to one opinion, the lex domicilii of the possessor is the

³⁰ So Savigny, § 368; Guthrie, p. 192; Unger, p. 178; Beseler, § 39, note 21; Roth, Bayer. Privatr. § 17, note 84. Laurent, vii. § 240, on the other hand, pronounces against any attention being paid to the lex fori. Even a French judge is, according to him, never to apply the lex fori to things which are in another country.

³¹ See this contradiction e.g. in Roth ut cit. notes 81 and 84.

³² For the view taken in the text, which rests partly on the application of the lex domicilii and partly on that of the lex rei sitæ, Massé, pp. 102, 103, and Wharton, § 381, note 7, both pronounce.

universal rule; this opinion³³ will in most cases give the same results as that which I have adopted in the text. Others propose that the lex rei sitæ shall be universally applied.³⁴ This latter opinion rests on the consideration that continuous possession is the fact at the bottom of prescription, and that this possession must be governed by the lex rei sitæ.³⁵ It is true that it is a permanent possession that is the foundation of prescription; the laws, therefore, which regulate prescription must have reference to some other possession than that which is merely for a time exercised in our country.³⁶ If a thing has been temporarily in different places, then, according to the opposite view, there must be a separate calculation of the proportional time during which the thing remained in each of these different places. This calculation of proportions can be carried out in applying our theory, by which the law of the domicile is applicable, and the lex rei sitæ only applicable in exceptional cases, to things, or aggregates of things, where these are permanently attached to some particular place, and by which at the same time the onus is laid upon the possessor, who invokes this exceptional application. But the calculation cannot be carried out if we attempt to follow the changes of locality to which moveables of all kinds are subject, changes which no one can control. That is the true reason why those writers who regard the lex rei sitæ alone, following Savigny's lead, take as their guide simply the law of the place in which the thing last was.³⁷ But then an active effect is thus attributed to that law for a period during which the thing was not, as a matter of fact, within the territory.³⁸ In this way it would be possible for a thing, the possession of which had not yet run for the full time, to be at once transferred to the ³³ J. Voet in Dig. 43, 4, No. 12. Pothier, Traité de la Prescription, No. 242. Merlin, Rép. Vo. Prescription, sect. 1, § 3, No. 7. Haus's theory (p. 34), that the lex domicilii of the owner rules, has very little influence. It can only proceed upon the untenable assumption that the owner can only be deprived of his property by the operation of the laws of his domicile. By this means, it might be that, under certain circumstances, an intolerable privilege might be conferred on foreigners, e.g. if it should be that there was no such thing as prescription by their law, or only under conditions very hard to realise.

³⁴ So Molinæus in L. 1, C. de S. Trin.; Günther, p. 737; Mühlenbruch, i. § 73; Oppenheim, p. 398; Wächter, ii. p. 385.

³⁵ Savigny, § 367; Guthrie, p. 186; Unger, p. 176. But both of these authors speak of prescription only, and not of limitation of actions.

³⁶ The question, whether at a particular moment of time one became possessor, is of course to be settled by the law of the place where the thing then was; and the lex rei sitæ may indirectly be of great importance, although in general the lex domicilii must, as we have said, give the rule.

³⁷ So Roth, Deutsch. Privatr. i. § 51, note 99; Bayer, Privatr. i. § 17, note 85; Stobbe, § 32, note 17; Fiore, § 204; Laurent, § 246 (who, however, reads the provision of § 2279 of the Code Civ. simply as an extinctive prescription); Asser-Rivier, § 44; Weiss, pp. 766, 767. Of course, this theory will respect the prescriptive possession which has already, according to the law of the previous residence, been completed, see Savigny as cited. The theory which I have adopted (cf. § 225) is partly in agreement with Roth's and Stobbe's views.

possessor in full ownership by a change of locality, that change being a matter which would be entirely under his own control.³⁹

Lastly, there is a theory by which a marked distinction is drawn between the limitation of real actions and the prescriptive acquisition of a right; while the latter, according to the character of the thing, is to be determined by the lex domicilii of the possessor or the lex rei sitæ, the former, as being a rule in limitation of an action, and touching merely the question of procedure, is subject to the law of the place where the process depends.⁴⁰ But we have seen already that very many material rules of law are disguised as mere rules of procedure, and this is the case with the limitation of actions. It is not by any rules of process that it is made incompetent to raise an action after a certain period. If it were so, the limitation would first come into existence with the action, and it would not be for the judge to say by his sentence, as is the case, whether it had been established before the action was begun. There is accordingly a rule recognised by the older authorities: "Præscriptio pertinet ad decisionem litis, non ad ordinationem causæ."

[The law of England seems to have adopted the rule laid down by the House of Lords in the case of Don v. Lippman, 1837, 5, Cl. and F. 1, viz. that the lex fori will regulate all questions of prescription, although Mr Westlake, § 238, regards the principle as extremely questionable.

That case, being a judgment pronounced in a Scots case, is of course regulative of the Scots law, and is in accordance with the doctrine of Erskine (iii. 7, 48) and Story, § 576, who regard prescriptions as belonging to the litis ordinatio. The judgment is, however, looked upon by Mr Guthrie (Savigny, p. 269) as subversive of the older and sounder law of Scotland. He reviews all the authorities, and reference is made to his learned note.]

³⁹ Savigny says, "There can be no doubt that all these periods of possession (during which the thing has been in different territories) must be added together. The term of the prescription, however, and the complete acquisition of the property, must be judged of by the law of the place at which the thing is last found, because it is only at the expiration of the whole period that the change of property takes place; before it has only been in preparation." That the periods should be added together is in itself quite right, but that does not imply that the product is to be regarded exactly as the law of the last place concerned would regard it. The proper course rather is to make a calculation of the proportions of the different periods.

Stobbe seems to think that a proportional calculation of this kind may be supported in the case of a change in the period of prescription brought about by new legislation within the territory. But when a change of locality takes place, it is then that the caprice of the individual comes into play, as Stobbe points out, and therefore there is necessarily some danger in applying exclusively the law of the last place to which the thing was brought. But, if we take the analogy of the theory, which Stobbe seems to hold to be correct with regard to alterations of the law within the territory, the possessor can only appeal to the prescriptive period which is applicable by the law of the place in which the thing is subsequently found, on the footing that the period of possession which he has enjoyed under the law where the thing originally was, shall not be taken into account.

⁴⁰ Story, § 576 and § 582.

3. RIGHTS in re aliena.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

§ 238. The rules of law concerning jura in re aliena are partly subject to modification at the will of the parties, partly limitations imposed on the parties in the interest of the freedom of property. In the former class, as Fiore (208) and Laurent (viii. §§ 300-302) have pointed out, some other law than that of the lex rei sitæ may rule: it may be the law of the contract by which the right is set up, the law by which a testament is to be construed, or the law of the domicile of the parties concerned. The rules of the second class, on the other hand, must always be applied as the lex rei sitæ directs.^{41 42} No doubt it may be difficult, in particular cases, to distinguish the two classes. In such cases, of course, the law of the place in which the thing in question is, must rule, and, as we shall see hereafter, in contracts referring to particular items of real estate, a certain presumption obtains that the parties are subjected to the lex rei sitæ, even although they might have given it the go-bye. The result, therefore, is that in practice, where real rights over immoveable estate are concerned, there is a preponderance in favour of the application of the lex rei sitæ, so that many authorities, especially in Germany, using what is, literally taken, too broad an expression, speak of the exclusive dominion of the lex rei sitæ.⁴³

We do not propose to discuss the matter here in detail, for there is an infinite variety of real rights. It is rather the province of a treatise which takes up the subject of private international law from the standpoint of some particular territorial law to deal with them. We may, however, for the sake of illustration, point out that the duties of a liferenter as against the fiar may possibly, e.g. if the liferent is the creation of a family relationship, be determined by the personal law;⁴⁴ but, on the

⁴¹ Cf. Code Civ. § 686. "Il est permis aux propriétaires d'établir sur leurs propriétés, ou en faveur de leurs propriétés, telles servitudes que bon leur semble, pourvu néanmoins que les services établis ne soient imposés ni à la personne, ni en faveur de la personne, mais seulement à un fonds et pour un fonds et pourvu que ces services n'aient d'ailleurs rien de contraire à l'ordre public."

⁴³ Savigny, § 368; Guthrie, pp. 187, 188; Unger, p. 177; Stobbe, § 32, note 18; Roth, D. Privatr. § 51, note 95. In my former edition I took this view.

other hand, the rule of the Code Civil, § 595, which allows contracts of lease, granted by the liferenter, to endure for nine years after the close of the liferent, but no longer, is a rule of law which must always be respected as the lex rei sitæ.⁴⁵ This last rule of law, which is different from the Roman rule, exists in the interests of agriculture. The farmer, whose rights should, in strict logic, come to an end with the rights of the liferenter, is to have security for a specified time, while, on the other hand, the liferenter is not to anticipate unduly the rights of the owner who comes after him.⁴⁶ The lex rei sitæ, too, must be taken to determine the maximum duration of the usufruct that can be given to a corporation (e.g. settled by the 619th article of the Code Civ. at 30 years); the question here is a question of protecting the freedom of ownership against the undue prolongation of a burden. But it is plain that any one, who proposes to give a corporation an usufruct, may limit its duration as he likes, and may reduce it below the measure which is allowed by the lex rei sitæ, while the law of the nationality or the domicile must rule the interpretation of the testator's will. If this law, then, prescribes a shorter duration than the lex rei sitæ, we must in doubt hold that the usufruct of a real estate is given for this shorter period only.⁴⁷

APPLICATION OF THE GENERAL PRINCIPLES TO MOVEABLES.

§ 239. As regards real rights over moveables, in so far as the relations of the owner and the person enjoying any such right are concerned, the law of the place in which the thing by accident happens to be will be less frequently applied, and therefore the personal law or the territorial law, which governs the contract on which the servitude rests, will more frequently be applicable.

In such cases it will generally be possible somehow to set up an obligation to grant the real right in so far as the thing is in the power of the owner, and if the owner of the thing should carry it off to a country in which the right would not be recognised as a real right, he would as a general rule have to face an action of damages, or an action based on the obligation of recompense. The owner will not, then, be easily tempted to invoke the law of the place where the thing for the moment is, against the person who claims a servitude. The rule "mobilia personam sequuntur"

⁴⁵ Fiore, § 210, with reference to the Italian Code, which appoints in such case a limit of five years. Laurent, § 341.

⁴⁶ So, too, Laurent, vii. § 350. There is certainly no good object in extending this rule to the liferent of moveables. In these cases, the lex domicilii or the national law of the person setting up the liferent must have exclusive sway, the one or the other of them, according to the particular circumstances of the case.

⁴⁷ In the case of Emphyteusis and Superficies, the contract on which they rest points at the lex rei sitæ. See Fiore's thorough discussion (§§ 214-217) of the provisions of the Italian Code which would be unconditionally applicable to real estate situated in Italy (see, e.g. § 1564, on the right of free sale by the Emphyteuta, and § 1562, on the prohibition of sub-emphyteusis).

has a certain justification in fact in this connection. The law of the place where the thing for the moment is at some later period of its history may, however, be of importance for the rights of third parties in accordance with the principle laid down supra, § 226, No. 2.

It may be that a real effect should in one country be attributed to a contract, e.g. of hire or lease, while in another contract that effect is denied to it.

Savigny [§ 368, Guthrie, p. 188] is of opinion that such a real right will always arise if the lex rei sitæ gives it, no matter what the law which rules the contract in other respects says, and, on the other side, that it will not arise if the thing at the time of the contract⁴⁸ happens to be in a country in which that rule of law is unknown.

It will, however, in the former case depend on the intention of the parties in making their contract. We can hardly look upon a provision of that kind, which gives the hirer or lessee a real right against third parties, and particularly against a purchaser, as an absolute provision, which will not yield to the wishes of the parties.⁴⁹ It may be, then, that the parties only intended to create a relation that should have a purely personal effect, and whether they had that intention or not is a questio facti. In most cases that will have been their intention. That does not, however, settle what the rights of a singular successor of the hirer or lessee, or of a sub-tenant, will be. It is possible that, if he is in bona fide, the lex rei sitæ will secure him a real right.

But, in the second case, the question will be whether the law of the land, in which the thing is, gives parties the power of burdening the thing to any extent they please with personal servitudes, or at least of doing so in so far as contracts of lease are concerned, and whether this power can be exercised without solemnities. If this power must be admitted in accordance with the lex rei sitæ, there would be no reason for denying the real character of the right of the hirer or lessee, if the parties intended that it should have that character.⁵⁰ In most cases of contracts about immoveable property that will not have been their intention (see the law of obligations). But, for instance, if two Prussians domiciled in the territory of the Prussian Allgem. Landr. conclude a contract for the hire of a thing that happens to be within the territory of the Roman law, there is no doubt that a real right might arise, if that were the intention of the parties; and a real right of that kind, which had arisen within the territory of the Prussian Allgem. Landr., might be made effectual in the territory of the common Roman law, if the thing were subsequently brought there. The common law of Rome does, as a matter of fact, recognise rights of use in particular moveables of the nature of servitudes, which can be followed out against third parties in possession of the things; the acquisition of possession in a country where that law prevails does not guarantee any protection against an action at the instance of the person having right to the servitude, and does not therefore annul the right which has arisen, and validly arisen, within the territory of the Allgem. Preuss Landr. It would, however, be different if the thing were afterwards possessed in a country where the rule "possession vaut titre" prevailed as regards moveables. In that case the real right is irreconcilable with the right of the possessor, and is therefore extinguished. Savigny (ut cit.) thinks that recognition should be denied in the territory of the Roman law to the real right which has arisen within the territory of the Prussian Allgem. Landr., because we have here to deal with a legal institution which is not recognised at all in the former territory. We must, however, dispute the value of this argument (see supra, § 29). The result would be—a result which Savigny himself repudiates—that, if property could only be acquired by means of a traditio in this country, no one could follow out here a right of property, acquired in another country without traditio, by a simple contract, on the ground that a right of property without an accompanying traditio is not recognised at all in our territory.

⁴⁸ By the Prussian Allgem. Landr. i. 2, §§ 135-137, the real right does not arise till the thing is delivered to the hirer or lessee: by the Code Civ. § 1743, the question turns upon whether that party has a "bail authentique," or a bargain with a certain date.

⁴⁹ So Laurent, vii. § 297.

⁵⁰ Cf. Laurent, vii. § 297, who in this matter rightly makes the intention of the parties the primary rule.

THE RIGHT OF PLEDGE.

§ 240. The right of pledge is the real right in a thing which can be made good against a third party in possession, its object being to compel satisfaction of a personal obligation. A right of pledge is, therefore, dependent on—1st, the existence of a valid obligation, and that by the law to which the obligation is subject; ⁵¹ 2nd, the law of the place in which the thing happened to be at the time of the legal transaction or occurrence on which the right of pledge is founded: it is only the latter that is to be discussed here. The former subject belongs to the law of obligations,⁵² just as do all the obligations⁵³ which arise between the person who gives

⁵¹ The law of obligation recognised at the place where the thing is is only of moment in so far as it may be impossible, by reason of the theory of that law that it is illegal to satisfy the obligation in question, to constitute a right of pledge, although by the lex loci contractus the obligation may be quite valid: if, for instance, a security should be given over an estate in this country in satisfaction of a gambling debt. The cases are the same as those in which it would be incompetent to raise action in our courts (Burge, iii. p. 390). As the pledge serves to secure the obligation, it is only valid in so far as the personal obligation is legal according to the law regulating it; and, in the same way, it only covers such interest as is permitted by the lex loci contractus, although by the lex rei sitæ a higher rate might be allowed (Burge, iii. p. 395). See, too, the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, reported there.

⁵³ The same thing is true, of course, as to the interpretation of any accessory agreements which the parties may have. E.g. the Prussian Allgem. Landr. i. 20, §§ 26, and 225-227, the pledge and the person who gets it, so soon as the thing is delivered to the latter (Actio pignoratitia directa and contraria).⁵⁴ The duty of submitting all such questions to the law which governs the obligation may, however, be modified, if it should happen that the law recognised at the place where the article pledged is, adopts, in the interest of third parties acquiring in good faith, the principle of what is called the independence of the hypothec, or recognises the possibility of debts heritably secured being entirely independent.^{55 56} The discussion of these questions, however, would lead us too far into the laws of particular States. The prevailing view, then, is that the existence of the right of pledge is in general determined by the lex rei sitæ, although many authorities, simply on the ground of the fiction of the situation of moveables at the domicile of the owner or possessor,⁵⁷ make an exception in the case of moveables, and judge of the conditions of the origin of the right by the lex domicilii of the pledger.

There is no reason for departing from the general rule as to the application of the lex rei sitæ, since it does not require any permanent relation of possession to originate the right of pledge. In many cases, however, the view we have taken will coincide in its results with that which makes the lex domicilii of the debtor the rule; for moveables can be brought into the territory of that country to which the debtor personally belongs, and then, if the legal relation from which the pledge takes its rise continues, these moveables will come within the scope of the law of pledge as that is understood by the lex domicilii.

CREATION OF SECURITIES OVER REAL PROPERTY BY DEEDS EXECUTED IN ANOTHER COUNTRY.

§ 241. The differences which exist among different legal systems in this construes the agreement that the pledgee is not to have the power of alienation, to the effect that the debt is to be satisfied out of the fruits and the use had of the thing pledged, or, if this cannot have been the view of the parties in the circumstances, to the effect that sale shall not take place except in the event of the pledgee's bankruptcy, a result which would not be prevented by the personal action against him. An agreement of that kind meant under the Roman law that three premonitions should be given. L. 4, 5, D. de pignor. act. 13, 7.

The effect of a subsidiary bargain as a real contract must, however, be determined by the lex rei sitæ. The so-called lex commissoria has e.g. no operation as a real contract, if such an agreement is invalid by the lex rei sitæ.

⁵⁴ Fiore, § 220, p. 307.

⁵⁵ See on this subject Beseler, § 103, note 36.

⁵⁶ What is the result if, conversely, the lex rei sitæ does not recognise a contract to grant security, or fasten any personal obligation on the owner who proposes to create such a right? We must hold in such a case that the person founding on the contract has subjected himself to these provisions, and of that there can be no doubt, if he is domiciled in the territory of the lex rei sitæ. The Court of the Empire (iii.) determined on 27th May 1886 (Bolze, Praxis, 3, No. 17) that in such a case no personal obligation could be created by a contract concluded in another country.

⁵⁷ So J. Voet in Dig. 20, 2, No. 34; Boullenois, i. pp. 833, 834; Matthæus, de Auctionibus, i. cap. 21, No. 41.

very subject of the law of pledge give rise to many difficulties and disputes, in spite of the simplicity of the principles to be applied.

(1.) Is it possible to create a security over real property by a deed executed in another country?

This question has been raised in consequence of a misunderstanding in the jurisprudence of France. However, it is a matter of interest for the whole international treatment of the law of pledge that it should be investigated. In sound legal reasoning, the answer is simply this: If the form which is required by the lex rei sitæ can be observed in the other country as well, then a hypothec or security may be constituted by a deed executed in that other country: if not, then it cannot be so executed. If, then, the lex rei sitæ requires the security to be entered in some public books or records, which can only be done at the place where the thing is, or at least only by officials of that country, then a deed executed abroad can never directly set up the security as a real right. But, on the other hand, if we are contented with a public document, i.e. one attested by public officials, and as regards its date beyond all doubt, such a document can be procured in another country, and is then as good a foundation for the security as any other. If, again, a declaration officially certified and emitted by the person who is entitled to create a security is sufficient warrant for the official of the country, in which the thing is, proceeding to make an entry in his register, it is not easy to see why a public document executed in another country should not give a good title to demand registration of a security, if any recognition at all is to be given to foreign public documents as conclusive pieces of evidence.

German practice and German legislation on this subject are fixed on this point, that they allow securities to be engrossed in public books only if they are authenticated as public documents: and this again is the only means by which they can acquire effect as real rights. The Belgian statute of 16th December 1851, § 77, takes the same ground; it sets, however, foreign public documents on an equal basis with Belgian public documents, and only prescribes that their genuineness shall first be tested by the President of the Civil Court.⁵⁸

On the other hand, the law of France confuses the executorial effect of public documents and judgments with their effect as evidence. By the older law of France, every personal bond in the form of a notarial instrument, and every acknowledgment before a notary of a bond privately executed, created, as a matter of common law, and without any special stipulation being required, a hypothec over the whole property of the debtor, which served as a preliminary stage of a parata executio. This hypothec was a result of the executorial force of the instrument. The ordinance of 15th January 1629, § 121, confused in a strange tangle

⁵⁸ See particularly Haus, Dr. Pr. p. 394. This Belgian statute abolished also the implied hypothec attributed to the judgment and to the notarial instrument ipso jure, without respect to the intention of the parties.

the executorial effect of an instrument and its effect as proof, and the legal effect of a judicial award, and went so far as to withdraw all the effect as evidence due to publicly attested documents from foreign instruments, even in matters of voluntary jurisdiction, if French subjects had any part in them. This provision has in part passed away with the abolition of the distinction between French and non-French parties in the 2128th article of the Code Civil.⁵⁹ It is not, however, easy to see why the owner, who by a legal transaction in a foreign country can divest himself of his real property, or burden it with servitudes, should not be able to constitute a security over it by a public document executed in a foreign country, although it is of course quite sound to hold that, if the hypothec implied in an obligation is looked upon as the first stage of diligence, no such effect shall be attributed to a foreign document, or to a foreign judgment.⁶⁰

RIGHTS OF PLEDGE ARISING BY OPERATION OF LAW.

§ 242. (2.) It may be that the law, without the parties having themselves had any such result in their view, makes a right of pledge arise directly from the transaction. In such cases we remark, for the purposes of international law:—

(a.) Unless the forms prescribed by the lex rei sitæ are observed, no right of pledge arises. But that does not supply an answer to the question, whether a legal relation, which in all other respects is ruled by a foreign law, may not found an obligation to constitute a right of pledge in the forms of the lex rei sitæ, may not give a title which the lex rei sitæ must recognise.⁶¹

(b.) If the law, to which the legal relation which is to be secured by the hypothec is subject, and the lex rei sitæ concur in holding that a right of pledge, or a title to demand one, arises from the contract, there is no reason for disputing the operation of that foreign legal relation on the ground that the hypothec would serve to secure a legal relation which

⁶⁰ French jurists of the most recent date are pretty much at one in thinking that § 2128 of the Code Civil rests upon an obvious misunderstanding. Cf. Duguit, Forme, p. 106. Laurent, vii. § 391, says very rightly that the authors of this article have confused the rights of sovereignty and the rights of the parties as independent contracting persons. See, too, Lyon-Caen, J. ix. p. 250; Weiss, p. 790; Fiore, § 222. Fiore points out that the confusion we have noticed appeared in some degree reasonable at a time when securities were not as yet registered. The Italian statute book says simply and soundly, “Gli atti seguiti in paese estero, che si presentano per l'iscrizione, devono essere debitamente legalizzati.” § 2128 has involved Frenchmen resident abroad in many disadvantages, a result such as often flows from provisions of this kind that take their rise in the darkness and obscurity of foolish notions of isolation and sovereignty. More modern treaties have no doubt done some good by means of consular jurisdiction. Cf. Weiss, p. 792. Fiore, too, Effetti, § 202.

⁶¹ See Loiseau, Traité de tutelle, p. 249.

belongs to another country, or would give security to a foreigner. (Fiore, Effeti, § 205, urges that such an ipso jure hypothec may be regarded as having been silently consented to, as a hypotheca tacita.) Any other view is at variance with the principle, now universally recognised as a rule, that foreigners and natives are to be recognised as having equal rights in matters of private international law. No recognition has been extended to any such theory except in France,⁶² and there only on the ground of the doctrine, which we have already (§ 96) pronounced to be mistaken, of the distinction between droits civils and droits naturels. The more modern theoretical French jurists are more and more in agreement that this distinction should be rejected,⁶³ although it is still recognised in practice, and in particular is maintained intact as regards the implied hypothec of the married woman, and the minor who is under curatory.⁶⁴

But in my view the principle thus adopted suffers an exception in the case of these implied rights of pledge which belong to the State, the fisk, as such [over the property of its officers]. Privileges of this kind have reference only to the State to which a person belongs, and the same must hold true of other corporations, which in truth are mere subdivisions of the organisation of the State, e.g. burghs and provinces. It may be otherwise in the case of ecclesiastical foundations and charitable foundations (see supra, § 107).

(c.) If the law, by which the legal relation is in other respects ruled—that relation to secure which by a hypothec is the matter under our consideration—gives it no implied hypothec, and no right to claim one, there is no reason for assigning one to it, should this be the effect of the lex rei sitæ. The implied right of pledge given by the law rests on this ground, that the legislature holds that the legal relation in question requires and deserves such protection.⁶⁵ But if that relation is ruled, not by the lex rei sitæ, but by some other system of law, which does not consider any such protection necessary, we cannot hold that the lex rei sitæ should, in spite of that, still give it.⁶⁶ If, for instance, the law which regulates the ⁶² Cf. Aubry et Rau, i. § 78, note 62, and the citations in Weiss, pp. 367, 368, note.

⁶⁴ Laurent, vii. § 394, proposes to allow the foreign State to enjoy this hypothec, if it exists both by its law and that of the lex rei sitæ.

⁶⁶ Cf. Rodenburg, ii. pars. 1, c. 5, § 16; J. Voet in Dig. 20, 2, § 34; Günther, p. 737; Merlin, Rép. Remploi; Troplong, Hypothèques, § 513. Cf., too, the judgment reported in the official journals of the judge of the Supreme Court of Baden, vol. xiii. (1852-1853). By this judgment a foreign married woman was refused the statutory right of pledge in real estate belonging to her husband in Baden, because married women who are foreigners can only make conduct of a tutory limits the powers of the guardian, so that the fiction of a statutory right of pledge over his estate is unnecessary, it would seem strange that the law of another country should add a statutory right of the kind to the other safeguards which it provides; and it would be specially inequitable if, for example, the law of the domicile required a special bond of caution from the guardian, while at the same time his estate abroad was burdened with a general statutory pledge,⁶⁷ from which the law of his domicile released him.⁶⁸ There are, no doubt, some to be found who maintain that no law but the lex rei sitæ can be regarded, because what we have to deal with here is a real right over immoveables. This view, however, rather belongs to the older schools of jurisprudence.⁶⁹

Conversely, if the law of the obligatory legal relation in question grants it the security of a hypothec, while the lex rei sitæ does not, the real right cannot be directly created by virtue of the former law. The multiplication of implied rights of pledge imperils the security of credit, and of transmission of property.⁷⁰ Although, therefore, the lex rei sitæ looks upon such rights as permissible in particular cases, without requiring them to be recorded in public books, it does not by any means follow that it will be inclined to allow the same serious effect to all other possible legal relations, in which a foreign law has thought proper to allow it. It will be all the less inclined to do so, since third parties may not always be able to find out easily whether a particular legal relation is to be ruled by foreign law, or by what foreign law it is to be ruled.

The result we reach, then, so far as we have to do with rights of pledge arising immediately by force of law, and requiring no further formalities to be observed to ensure publicity, is this: this implied right of pledge will arise only if the lex rei sitæ as well as the law which in other respects governs the legal relation so provide.⁷¹ This is true particularly of the implied security which a ward has over the property of his guardian. The ward has such a security only in so far as it exists both by virtue of the legal system which rules the guardianship and by the lex rei sitæ. No good a right of pledge under the same conditions as a native married woman can; and these conditions, among which was an antenuptial marriage contract in public form, were awaiting in the case under consideration. See Fiore, § 230.

⁶⁷ To the same effect, Loiseau, Traité de la tutelle, p. 250. Cf. judgment of the Rhenish Court of Cassation at Berlin, 20th February 1843 (Volkmar, p. 118): "§ 2136 of the Code Napoleon assumes that a guardian belonging to this country administers the estate in accordance with this country's laws. If in another country an implied hypothec is recognised, but is confined to its own territory, it is not to be stretched beyond these limits."

⁶⁸ Fœlix, § 67, p. 151. If the transaction in question falls under the lex rei sitæ—as is generally the case, for instance, if one has lent money to repair a house that has fallen into ruin—it is enough, of course, that the lex rei sitæ should give a statutory right of pledge. The foreign lender has the statutory right of pledge necessarily involved in such a loan by the provisions of Roman law (L. 1, D. 20, 2), if the house is in a country that recognises the common Roman law.

⁶⁹ Troplong, Des privilèges et hypothèques, § 429, approves of this implied security being regulated by the lex rei sitæ.

⁷⁰ Cf. Laurent, vii. § 397.

⁷¹ So, too, Stobbe, § 32, note 11.

exception is to be made for cases in which this implied right of pledge is referred to the conclusion of a bargain to that effect. We may admit that in many such cases this right was originally expressly stipulated, and that the usage of everyday life gradually raised this term of a contract into a condition which was universally implied, as we know very well from the 2nd title of the 20th book of the Digest was the case: "In quibus causis pignus vel hypotheca tacite contrahitur." But in truth the implied right of pledge is, even in such cases, and even where it is lawful to renounce it, not a provision of the contract by a tacit expression of intention: it is dispositive law. This implied right of pledge arises even if both parties are ignorant that any such right is created by the contract, or even if they believe the contrary.⁷² This implied right of pledge, with immediate operation as a real right, will not come into being in a case where it is deduced from some contract obligation, even although the lex rei sitæ is familiar with tacit rights of pledge springing directly from contracts, without the necessity of any particular form, unless the particular class of contract in question is one of those in which the lex rei sitæ recognises it.

It is, however, a different question whether the law that governs the obligation in other respects may not give rise to a supplementary obligation which should be recognised by the courts of the country in which the thing is, to the effect of compelling the constitution of an express right of pledge in the forms recognised by the lex rei sitæ. Fiore, § 225, who treats the questions that arise in this connection with much detail, maintains unhesitatingly that it does. We must, however, take a distinction.

There are, of course, two very different classes of cases: on the one hand, the law may directly associate a certain obligation with a corresponding right of security, which is originated without any special form, and is not published in any particular fashion, and is again extinguished of itself without any particular difficulties; on the other hand, the law may oblige a man to submit his property to a burden to be recorded in the public registers, which as a matter of fact frequently has an influence on his credit, and can often only be got rid of with difficulty, and in a formal judicial proceeding. From this we may draw this conclusion, viz.: If a man proposes to claim such a formal security as the consequence of a contract, he must stipulate expressly for it: he shall have no such claim as a matter of course over property of his debtor situated in another country, even although any property he may have in this country would be at once affected by a right of security without any visible shape or form.

The situation may, however, be different in those cases in which the implied security right, which does not require to be constituted in any formal method, is merely a quid pro quo—often very inadequate—to balance the extensive right of administration and enjoyment, which, for instance, the father has over his child's estate, or the husband over that of his wife. In such cases there can be no bargaining, and it may therefore be equitable to set the security right which arises directly over the estate in this country, and the security right which will require to be formally constituted over foreign property, on the same footing to a certain extent, by recognising in such cases a legal title to demand the constitution of a formal security according to the forms of the lex rei sitæ. Laurent (vii. § 298) is therefore plainly right in coming to the conclusion he does in the following case. The Belgian statute of 1851, in place of the direct security given ipso jure to wives and minors, gave these persons a legal title to require special securities which might be publicly registered. Laurent proposes to give French wives and French minors, by whose personal law the ipso jure security still exists, the same title as the Belgian law gives to its own subjects to require security over property belonging to their husbands or guardians in Belgium. As the law of Belgium coincides in other respects with that of France as regards the law of married persons' property and the law of guardianship, and as it holds this change of law to be equitable for Belgian wives and minors, it follows that, from the point of view of the Belgian law, it is equitable for French wives and minors also.

We must not, however, without further inquiry, assume any such substitute for the direct right of security arising ipso jure. Thus, for instance, the Prussian legislature (cf. Vormundschaftsordnung of 1875, § 58) holds that it is not politic to lay upon the guardian, constituting a special security whose property was, by the common law recognised in several Prussian territories, burdened with an implied ipso jure security, which was not published, in favour of the ward, an obligation to grant a special security.

The personal law will in the cases we have mentioned give the rule, but we must not assume in every case that the personal law will agree to substitute in place of the implied ipso jure, but unpublished, security, which is not recognised by the lex rei sitæ, a title, which is known only to that lex rei sitæ, to require a special security, and one that shall be published.⁷³

RIGHTS OF PLEDGE OVER MOVEABLES.

§ 243. (3.) With regard to moveables, special difficulties arise:—

(a.) Moveable things, too, will only be affected by a right of pledge, if the forms of the lex rei sitæ are observed.⁷⁴ But, if the intention to constitute a pledge, or the relation which ipso jure involves a pledge, continues to subsist,⁷⁵ that moveable will subsequently be affected by the right of ⁷³ Fiore, § 233, proposes to deal in this way with the French right of pledge which follows a judgment: this cannot, however, be approved, as the recognition of this hypothec goes deeply into the law of pawning and execution, which must be left entirely to the lex rei sitæ.

⁷⁴ Imperial Court (i.) 5th Sept. 1873 (Entsch. xi. § 7).

⁷⁵ It is not, however, to be assumed that it does subsist, and so a special pledge of a moveable article, which is invalid by reason of incomplete delivery, will frequently not come into operation without some new declaration of intention by the pledger, if the thing is subsequently brought into a territory, in which no delivery is necessary.

pledge, if it reaches a territory in which it is possible to constitute a pledge without any particular form, or which recognises and allows the form which is in accordance with the law that governs the legal relation the security of which it is desired to effect by the pledge. If, for instance, a man, in accordance with the law of his domicile, that is, the common law of Rome, pledges his whole property;⁷⁶ a moveable article belonging to him, which happens to be in some territory in which no pledge of moveables except by actual delivery is recognised, is not at once affected by this pledge. But the moment the thing reaches the territory in which the law of the pledger's domicile prevails, it falls under the impledgment.⁷⁷

(b.) A moveable thing, over which a right of pledge has been well constituted in conformity with the lex rei sitæ at one time, is not discharged of that burden by being brought into a territory by the law of which some different form would have had to be observed in order to constitute a pledge. But it is discharged of this burden, if a third person acquires, in accordance with the law of the place where the thing is subsequently found, a right in the thing which is incompatible with the subsistence of the pledge, or if by the law of that subsequent situation the right of pledge can only continue to subsist under a condition, which cannot be satisfied by the pledge as constituted by the law of the place where the thing originally was.⁷⁸ Thus a right of pledge, which could be constituted according to the law of country A over a moveable by a verbal treaty, will not be lost if the thing is subsequently brought into a country in which written documents are necessary to constitute a pledge. But a pledge constituted in country C, in which the Roman law of pledge obtains, without delivery of the thing, is extinguished if the thing is brought into territory D, in which the maxim "possessio valet titrè" prevails, or into some territory in which a right of pledge can only be constituted by possession, and can only subsist by virtue of possession.⁷⁹ In the latter case, however, if the thing is brought by the debtor to C, without any third person having acquired in D any right that is incompatible with the right of pledge, then, in accordance with what we have said, this right of pledge will at once revive.

⁷⁶ By the Roman law, as is well known, such an impledgment affects even property that may be subsequently acquired, and so, of course, property that has been acquired, but is only at some later date brought into the country or to the domicile of the pledger.

⁷⁷ The illustration from the law of the town of Hannover which I gave in my first edition is no longer applicable, as the law has been altered.

⁷⁸ See, too, Unger, p. 179. There is a complete and sound train of reasoning in a judgment of the Sup. Ct. of Appeal of Oldenburg, of 18th May 1861 (Seuffert, xvii. § 111). A judgment of the Supreme Court at Berlin, 8th April 1875 (Seuffert, xxxi. § 131), is less pointed, and recalls rather Savigny's reasoning: in its result it is quite sound: it denies effect to a general hypothec within the territory of the Prussian Allgem. Landr. because that law recognises only pledges coupled with actual delivery.

⁷⁹ This is the explanation of a remark of Thöl (§ 84, note 9): he argues thus against the regular application of the lex rei sitæ to real rights in moveables: "Two Prussians contracting, who, for instance, wished to constitute not a pledge (Faustpfand) but an hypothecation over a thing, a right which Prussian law does not recognise, need only take the thing for a short time over the frontier."

These rules, which are obvious to good sense,⁸⁰ rest on the principle of the importance which is due to the law of the place where the thing last was (see supra, § 225).

Savigny (§ 368, Guthrie, p. 191), who does not recognise this principle, but is much more taken up with the principle of vested rights, to which he refers in connection with this class of cases, can find no other foundation on which to put these results than to hold that the right of pledge created by bare contract is quite a different legal institution from that which may be created by delivery of the thing itself, that the two institutions have nothing more in common than their name and their general object, and that therefore the creditor would be appealing to a legal institution unknown to the law of Prussia.⁸¹

The fallacy of this reasoning appears from the following illustration: Suppose the legal system of a country will not recognise the validity of a pledge unless it is constituted by writing: a ship has been pledged in another country, by the law of which written documents are not necessary. According to Savigny, in such a case the impledgment of the ship would not be recognised in the former State. But, putting aside the very dangerous consequences of this doctrine, Savigny's whole reasoning rests, as we have noted (§ 29), upon that ambiguous rule, that a right which would not have come into being by the law of our country in the foregoing circumstances, should not be recognised by us. Even a right of pledge that arises by the operation of the law, once it has been well constituted by the operation of the lex rei sitæ, is not extinguished by the fact that the thing is brought into a territory in which the law would not hold that such a right had arisen in the circumstances, or in which there are no such rights of pledge by the operation of the law. According to Savigny's reasoning, we would reach results which would be in the highest degree dangerous for the rights of creditors who hold securities over ships.⁸² To refuse to recognise rights of security over ships simply on the ground that, in the country in which the ship last came to be, other forms of impledgment existed, or other circumstances were required to originate such a right, would destroy all the security of creditors.⁸³

⁸⁰ See Fiore, § 220c. On these cases, see Wharton (§ 323).

⁸² On rights of pledge over seagoing ships which arise by operation of law, see Code de Commerce, §§ 191-194. Ally. Deutsches Handelsgesetzbuch, §§ 757, 758, and infra on maritime law. The view taken in the text is confirmed by the judgment of the Supreme Court of Louisiana reported by Story, § 327a. The case of vindication of goods sold ("stoppage in transitu," as it is termed in England) is analogous, if by the law of the country where the thing was at the time of the sale the property is not passed, and the goods are then claimed by the seller at a place by the law of which the property has passed. See the decision of an English court upon this point in conformity with the view in the text. Story, § 402, note. [Inglis v. Usherwood, 1, East. 515.] The creditors of the bankrupt merchant who had received the goods in England had to give them up. Cf. Deutsche Concursordnung, § 36.

⁸³ Story, § 402a.

PRIORITY OF RIGHTS OF PLEDGE.

§ 244. The priority of rights of pledge is determined by the lex rei sitæ; and as regards immovables, there can be no question of this. In moveables, the law of the place where the thing was at the moment the competition took place decides; this is a result of the rule, that in so far as one acquires a new right in a thing in one territory, the right which was previously acquired in it in another territory is limited or destroyed.⁸⁴
